1.0 Key Findings

2.0 Executive Summary

Rainbow Rights Watch is a not-for-profit social justice organisation dedicated to ending inequality, discrimination and violence against transgender Australians.

Evidence consistently shows that transgender Australians are poorly understood or tolerated by mainstream society and face unconscionable rates of social exclusion, rejection, poor health, bullying, discrimination, abuse, and violence. Many Australians have never met an openly transgender person, and their only experience of gender diversity comes from the portrayals of transgender people in the media. Media coverage of transgender issues plays a pivotal role in shaping public perceptions of the transgender community.

Our background research provided evidence of a significant issue of negative bias in the press coverage of transgender Australians, which in turn sustains a climate of prejudice. In 2016, Monash Health, Victoria's largest public health service, issued a statement of concern about media coverage that contains "unbalanced discussion where selected pieces of information, which are outdated and irrelevant, are used in a distorted manner to promote a message of hatred and ignorance."¹ Similarly, the Full Court of Appeal of the Family Court of Australia observed in late 2017 that "this case, and other earlier cases involving Gender Dysphoria, have attracted widespread media attention. Insofar as the reporting of the legal issues is concerned, at least some of the reports have, at best, been incomplete and, at worst, inaccurate."²

To better understand the state of reporting, Rainbow Rights Watch undertook to analyse the press coverage of issues involving transgender Australians between 1 January, 2016 and 31 December, 2017. Our analysis covered a total of 8.3 million words in 6,896 articles published in print and online within Australia. Semantics, tone and sentiment were analysed quantitatively using mass cloud computing and self-learning software to evaluate the natural language of articles. Additionally, matters of emphasis, factual accuracy, balance, fairness, and inclusion of material facts were evaluated using background checks and critical qualitative techniques.

Using a multi-variate regression analysis, we found evidence of significant negative bias towards transgender individuals in the Australian press. Of all articles analysed, only 12% contained a positive sentiment, while 51% contained a negative sentiment. 37% had a neutral sentiment. More concerning was a strong correlation ($r^2 = 0.58$) identified between article sentiment and the frequency of the word "transgender" in the article's contents. Articles that contained the word "transgender" more frequently had lower sentiment. Articles that contained the word "transgender" on five or more occasions had a 67% lower sentiment than articles that only contained the word "transgender" once. In other words, the more an article centred on transgender issues, the lower the sentiment fell. The sentiment in opinion articles was 50% lower than news articles.

We adopted a qualitative analysis in an effort to better understand some of the sources of such strong negative sentiment. Articles were analysed against journalistic ethics principles, as well as best practice style guides from GLAAD, the Victorian Equal Opportunity and Human Rights Commission and the New York Times. Claims made in articles about medical efficacy were checked against medical studies and contemporary medical reports.

We found that negative bias manifested in the following forms:

1. Frequent use of prejudicial language and tone that subjugates transgender Australians, undermines their dignity, or sets them apart from the rest of society;
2. Excessive emphasis placed on a person's transgender status that is not proportional to the news story being covered;

3. Repeated and continuing publication of distressing and inflammatory opinions likely to cause serious offence and distress to transgender people without any opportunity for expression of a balancing view, reply, or rebuttal;
4. Opinion pieces relating to transgender Australians that are based on dishonest or distorted representations of fact;
5. Complete failure to give voice to transgender Australians on the issues about which they are the most significantly affected population;
6. Misrepresentation or mischaracterisation of law and medical science relating to Gender Dysphoria;
7. Politically confected claims that transgender people are a threat to the moral fabric of society;
8. Factual errors in reports, accompanied by a lack of proper remedial action; and
9. Failure to properly moderate public comments

The lack of transgender representatives in editorial decision-making positions coupled with a strong resistance amongst some publishers to give any voice to liberal transgender views, means most transgender Australians are effectively silenced in the press, and Australians are exposed to a very narrow range of views on transgender issues. This causes transgender individuals to withdraw from public debate, repress their identities, or hide their transgender status. It also cultivates distrust of the media within the transgender community and shapes cisgender attitudes towards transgender people by fostering ignorance, inflaming derogatory views and sustaining an environment in which transphobia is tolerated or even sanctioned. This in turn endangers the physical, psychological and financial security of transgender Australians.

Because transgender voices, especially progressive transgender voices, are grossly under-represented in the press, transgender individuals tend to rely heavily on regulatory measures to preserve fairness in media reporting of transgender issues. Only some States have laws protecting transgender individuals from press vilification.³ Even where vilification protections do exist, academic evidence shows that vilification proceedings can be protracted, uncertain and emotionally draining for a transgender person trying to defend their dignity. Accordingly, transgender vilification lawsuits are infrequently pursued.

An alternative to litigation is to lodge a complaint with the Australian Press Council. The Australian Press Council is a self-regulating industry body responsible for “promoting good standards of media practice”.⁴ It is the principal organisation responsible for handling complaints about press publications. The Australian Press Council complaints process is promoted as a cheap, prompt alternative to litigation. Unfortunately, our analysis indicates that the Australian Press Council is ineffective, in both its policy function and its adjudication function, in holding the Australian press publicly accountable for fair and honest reporting on matters affecting transgender Australians.

In addition to analysing the state of media coverage, our analysis also critically examined a number of adjudication determinations by the Press Council made in relation to complaints lodged by transgender Australians. In its determinations, the Press Council failed, on several occasions, to properly distinguish between crucial matters of gender identity, gender stereotypes, and gender expression. Other determinations, in our view, failed to distinguish between aspects of a person’s transgender status that were relevant to a news story and those that were gratuitous.

To the extent we have been able to ascertain, no transgender Australians are represented within the functions and decisions of the Press Council and the Press Council resists requests from transgender Australians to consult with the transgender community to improve cultural competence.

In guidelines provided to journalists about reporting on race, the Press Council states that “the press needs to show more sensitivity in reporting issues when minority groups are perceived in the community to be more ‘different’ or when ‘they are the subject of particular public debate’.” A number of transgender Australians wrote to the Australian Press Council in January 2017 urging it to critically examine the state of reporting on transgender issues, and encouraging it to publish equivalent guidelines, as some press oversight organisations in other jurisdictions have done, to assist journalists to report respectfully and sensitively about transgender Australians. The Press Council has yet to respond after 12 months.

Our analysis now shows a sobering situation in which the spread of articles containing prejudicial language, slurs, factual errors, misleading claims and heavily slanted language sustains a social climate of gross prejudice against transgender Australians. Publishers do not merely stop at adopting partisan positions on issues affecting transgender Australians; they resort to distortion and dishonesty to advance those positions. Transgender Australians are portrayed as objects devoid of human qualities such as kindness, empathy, love, family and community. Instead, their bodies are offered up as public amusements, and their struggles against discrimination, abuse and social dispossession are overlooked entirely. Publishers rarely afford any voice to transgender Australians in debates about their basic rights to medical care and participation in society. Transgender Australians are accused of corrupting the innocence of childhood, of destroying truth and free speech, and blamed for entirely contradicting supposed social wrongs such as simultaneously reinforcing and deconstructing gender stereotypes.

The current standard of reporting contains all the hallmarks of the 1980's media-driven moral panic about gay Australians which sustained an enduring pattern of public violence and discrimination.

Legal remedies for press vilification are out of reach for many transgender Australians, and the Australian Press Council is passive, slow, culturally unaware, and generally indifferent to an obvious trend of negative bias. An unregulated press industry is, in all likelihood, being used as a blunt instrument to ridicule and demean some of Australia's most powerless, disenfranchised and dispossessed individuals.

Rainbow Rights Watch makes a number of recommendations below to improve the standards of reporting. Rainbow Rights Watch would urge that, in the continuing absence of affirmative action or change on the part of the press industry or the Australian Press Council, a Parliamentary Inquiry should be convened to examine the state of reporting on transgender issues and the harmful effect it is having on transgender Australians, and in particular, transgender youth.

3.0 Recommendations

Recommendations for Journalists and Writers:

1. Journalists should avoid the use of generalisations that cast transgender Australians as confused, delusional, lacking in intelligence, imprudent or otherwise inferior to other Australians, unless such claims are supported by credible evidence.
2. Journalists should avoid making reference to an individual's transgender status unless it is essential and pertinent to the story and its pertinence is obvious to the reader.
3. Journalists should avoid disclosing sensitive details about a transgender person's intimate body parts, medical history, former name or identity, unless the information is essential and pertinent to the story, and its pertinence is obvious to the reader.
4. To avoid unnecessarily exciting irrational hope or fear in the public, journalists should exercise care and caution when making statements about the risk and efficacy of medical treatments for gender dysphoria. Statements about medical efficacy and risk should be guided by the weight of evidence, not the journalists' personal political orientation or religious beliefs.
5. Given the low levels of understanding of transgender issues and the real risk of inciting public prejudice or unnecessary fear, journalists and publishers should exercise caution and care to report accurately and fairly on matters of human rights, domestic law, and medical science relating to the management and treatment of gender dysphoria. Journalists should be guided by the weight of evidence rather than ideological, religious or commercial agendas.
6. Journalists should avoid the use of slurs, dehumanising language, and vilifying language when referring to transgender individuals. Style Guides, such as that produced by GLAAD, can assist journalists in the use of appropriate language.
7. Journalists should seek out and give voice to transgender views when publishing articles that directly affect the health and welfare of transgender Australians.

Recommendations for Publishers:

8. Publishers should avoid the publication of, and moderate public comments to prevent the publication of, slurs, dehumanising language and vilifying language when referring to transgender individuals.
9. Publishers should report responsibly, fairly, and in the public interest. Publishers should seek to give voice to transgender individuals, especially in the coverage of issues that directly impact the health and wellbeing of transgender Australians.
10. Publishers should respond promptly and fairly to complaints from transgender Australians. Factual inaccuracies, omissions of key facts, and misleading coverage should be promptly corrected, and where they have resulted in harm to the health and wellbeing of transgender Australians, an apology should be issued.
11. Publishers should strive to achieve short term and long balance and fairness in reporting on transgender issues to ensure Australians are exposed to a range of views. Publishers should not focus unnecessarily on the bodies of transgender Australians to the omission of their qualities as humans.

Recommendations for the Australian Press Council:

12. The Australian Press Council should immediately undertake a review of the integrity of reporting on transgender issues and, if appropriate, formulate guidelines to assist journalists and publishers to report accurately and fairly.
13. As well as complaints about the content of individual articles, the Australian Press Council should consider and accept complaints about issues of long term balance that materially contributes to public prejudice and discrimination.
14. Given the lack of representation of transgender Australians in the press oversight process, the Australian Press Council should undertake training or a consultation process to improve cultural competence in adjudicative and policy functions relating to transgender issues.
15. The Australian Press Council should remove the 30 day time limit on the lodgment of complaints. The 30 day limit, which may have been appropriate when the dominant form of publication was print, may be poorly suited to the digital era when damaging publications can remain perpetually online and continue to spread misapprehension and hate long after the publication date.
16. The Australian Press Council should establish performance targets to ensure complaints are resolved promptly and should hold itself publicly accountable for meeting such productivity goals.
17. The Australian Press Council does not currently issue tracking numbers for complaints, or provide periodic updates on the status of complaints. Given that some complaints can go unanswered for many months, the Press Council should provide a tracking number for complaints and provide regular updates to complainants on the progress of complaints towards resolution or disposal.
18. Currently, complainants who are indirectly harmed by distortion and dishonesty contained in press articles are limited to a 400 word submission, whilst publisher respondents are able to make comprehensive written or oral submissions to adjudicators. As a matter of procedural fairness, the Press Council should amend its adjudication process to allow for equal representation by both complainants and respondents, and the ability to refute or reply to flawed defenses raised by publishers.

Recommendations for Legislators:

19. In the continuing absence of positive action or change on the part of the press industry or the Australian Press Council, a Parliamentary Inquiry should be convened to examine the state of reporting on transgender issues and the potential risk of community harm by an unregulated press.

Recommendations for LGBTI Advocacy Groups:

20. Advocacy groups should publish annual or biannual media monitoring reports to measure the impact of the above recommendations on reducing discriminatory reporting, and to help hold the press industry accountable for integrity, fairness and honesty in reporting and opinion writing.

4.0 Background Information

Gender is a complex subject matter, and some readers of the press media might not be familiar with all of the terms and language used in discussions around gender. To assist in the interpretation of results, important terms and concepts are set out below.

4.1 Gender Diversity

Gender is a multi-dimensional construct involving inter-related aspects of identity, biology, self-expression, social roles, and social structures of power.

Sex assignment is a determination, made at birth by a physician, about the sex of an infant. The infant's sex is commonly recorded on the birth certificate. In most, but not all cases, the infant's physiology is unambiguously male or female. The assignment of a child's sex documented on the birth certificate goes on to affect the child's legal rights and the social expectations placed on them over the course of their life.

Society often prescribes particular identity attributes, behaviours, roles, and expectations to particular individuals on the basis of their assigned sex. Particular traits and behaviours are considered appropriate or desirable for particular people based on actual or perceived sex assignment. These expectations set the groundwork for the social construct of 'gender' with the prescribed gender roles often falling into dichotomous categories of 'masculine' and 'feminine'.

Gender identity describes a person's self-perception of having a particular gender. It is an integral and foundational aspect of a person's identity. There is a clear consensus amongst researchers that a person's innate sense of gender is solidified (gender formation) by the age of three. Attempts to change or modify a person's gender identity beyond this age frequently result in gender dysphoria, and are now widely viewed as unethical.

A transgender person is someone who experiences a dissonance between their gender identity and the sex they were assigned at birth. Some, but not all, transgender people experience gender dysphoria, which is distress about their primary and secondary sex characteristics.

A person's gender identity is distinct from their sexual orientation, and transgender individuals can be romantically or sexually attracted to people of a variety of genders.

The opposite of 'transgender' is 'cisgender'. A person who is cisgender has a gender identity that aligns with the sex they were assigned at birth.

According to the American Psychological Association, "There is no single explanation for why some people are transgender. The diversity of transgender expression and experiences argues against any simple or unitary explanation. Many experts believe that biological factors such as genetic influences and prenatal hormone levels, early experiences, and experiences later in adolescence or adulthood may all contribute to the development of transgender identities."⁵ A study published by Zhong et al in 2006⁶ showed that in laboratory mice, prenatal exposure of the brain in utero to particular hormones correlated with lifelong behaviours typical of a mouse of the opposite biological sex. Irrespective of the biological or sociological basis of gender identity, there seems to be a general consensus that gender identity is immutable and cannot be changed.

Intersex variations are distinct from transgender identities. Intersex, as a category, involves biological variations whereby an individual's chromosomal sex, genitals, hormonal sex and secondary sex characteristics do not all unambiguously align as male or female. These variations in sex characteristics relate to the diversity of human bodies rather than identities, and people who have these variations will experience their gender identity in ways similar to the broader population. Most Births, Deaths and Marriages Registries of Australia are able to issue a birth certificate that recognises a person as neither male nor female.

Intersex people can experience a range of gender identities. If an intersex person experiences a gender identity that is different from the sex they were assigned at birth, they may also consider themselves transgender.

4.2 Gender Dysphoria

Gender dysphoria is a medical diagnosis descriptive of many people who experience varying degrees of dissonance or distress over of their primary or secondary sex characteristics. It is a condition that is recognised in the diagnostic manual of the American Psychiatric Association⁷. It is also recognised under the equivalent diagnoses, Gender Identity Disorder of Childhood and Transsexualism, by the World Health Organisation⁸, of which Australia is a member. It is neither a lifestyle choice nor a personal preference.

Not all transgender people experience gender dysphoria, although gender dysphoria almost exclusively occurs in transgender and intersex populations. Some transgender people undergo a course of medical treatment that relieves or cures dysphoria.

Gender dysphoria is a manageable, treatable, and often curable condition. Various treatment approaches are available and are set out in the Standards of Care (Version 7) provided by the World Professional Association for Transgender Health.⁹ Different treatment pathways exist for adults and children, reflecting the fact that children have lesser insight into what they are experiencing and lesser ability to communicate their experiences. Approaches to treatment can involve such things as psycho-counselling, social adjustments, and/or hormonal or surgical interventions. Treatment protocols are determined by the particular symptoms expressed by the patient.

Despite contrary claims repeated in the press, the existing treatment protocols do not “steer” the patient in any particular direction; nor do they encourage, popularise or promote any particular gender identity (or sexual orientation) as more natural, legitimate or favourable than any other. Rather, the gender affirmative model “supports identity exploration and development without an a priori goal of any particular gender identity or expression.”¹⁰ This is an important aspect of the treatment protocols that is frequently misrepresented or overlooked by the press.

4.3 Gillick Competency

The administration of therapeutic care for gender dysphoria to transgender youth of Australia is a matter that has received considerable coverage in the press with many opinion writers claiming that transgender youth should be deprived access to medical care until they reach the age of majority. Such claims seem to be predicated on the belief that gender dysphoria is a matter of personal choice or preference, rather than an innate and immutable matter of human diversity or medical pathology.

Some of the treatment approaches available in the Standards of Care are irreversible and can result in temporary or permanent infertility. Where such serious forms of treatment are being considered, the medico-legal doctrine of Gillick Competency is applied. Determination of “Gillick Competence” involves an of whether an adolescent possesses the maturity to fully comprehend the treatment being proposed and all the relevant consequences. The age at which Gillick competency is attained is the age at which medical autonomy is realised. That age varies with each individual and their rate of maturation.

The Gillick doctrine applies to all areas of medicine.¹¹ A person who is Gillick competent can do such things as: (a) withhold medical records from their parents; (b) procure contraceptive treatment without parental consent; or (c) procure a pregnancy termination without parental consent (subject to lawfulness which varies by jurisdiction).

Under Australian common law, only a Gillick competent individual can consent to potentially irreversible forms of treatment for gender dysphoria such as cross sex hormone therapy or breast reduction surgery.

Access to hormone therapy during pubertal years is vital to the health and wellbeing of transgender adolescents. Without hormonal interventions, an adolescent will undergo irreversible pubertal changes incongruent with their gender identity. For example a transgender girl’s voice will break, and a transgender boy will begin to develop breasts. Such changes frequently have been shown to exacerbate the long term effects of gender dysphoria.

Prior to undergoing sex reassignment surgery, the treatment protocols require that a patient attain the age of 18, have lived in their acquired gender for a period of more than one year, and be assessed for medical competency and the existence of any potential co-morbid mental health conditions.

4.4 Medical Efficacy

The World Professional Association for Transgender Health ("WPATH") Standards of Care constitute medical best practice for the care of gender dysphoric individuals. The Australian Standards of Care and Treatment Guidelines ("ASOCTG") endorse and expand on the WPATH treatment protocols by including information and recommendations uniquely relevant to Australian clinicians.

The Standards of Care contain no less than 370 references to high quality, peer-reviewed medical studies which underpin the treatment protocols. WPATH periodically examines all new credible research and updates the treatment guidelines in light of new medical evidence. The efficacy of treatment has also been verified by the world's largest medical associations. Those organisations are peak medical bodies and have no religious or ideological affiliations - their sole interest is the quality of life of the clients and patients served:

The 225,000 member American Medical Association declared in Resolution 122(A-08) that,

*"an established body of medical research demonstrates the effectiveness and medical necessity of mental health care, hormone therapy and sex reassignment surgery as forms of therapeutic treatment for many people diagnosed with [gender dysphoria]."*¹²

The 36,000 member American Psychiatric Association ("APA") declared in its 2012 position statement that the APA,

*"recognizes that appropriately evaluated transgender and gender variant individuals can benefit greatly from medical and surgical gender transition treatments."*¹³

The 117,000 member American Psychological Association stated in its 2008 policy that it

*"recognizes the efficacy, benefit and medical necessity of gender transition treatments for appropriately evaluated individuals and calls upon public and private insurers to cover these medically necessary treatments."*¹⁴

The 17,000 member International Endocrine Society has issued Clinical Practice Guidelines for the care of transgender children and adolescents. Its practice guidelines state:

*"There is a durable biological underpinning to gender identity that should be considered in policy decisions. Medical intervention for transgender individuals (including both hormone therapy and medically indicated surgery) is effective, relatively safe (when appropriately monitored) and has been established as the standard of care."*¹⁵

The 64,000 member American Academy of Pediatrics supports affirming healthcare for transgender children where indicated, stating

"While rates of depression are two- to three-times higher in transgender youth as compared to non-transgender individuals, a recent study published in Pediatrics showed that children who undergo a social transition in order to present in the gender they identify with have rates of depression comparable to non-transgender children. Other studies have shown that most of the psychiatric disorders in transgender adolescents derive from discrimination, peer rejection and lack of social support. The best predictor of positive psychological outcomes, according to research, is parental support.

It is important to point out that not all young transgender children will persist as such into adolescence, and that there might be different paths of gender development and degrees of complexity. Referral to a mental health professional with experience in this field can help guide families on difficult decisions such as undergoing a social transition.

Medical intervention before adulthood in transgender adolescents is also a matter that requires thoughtful consideration. A long-term study of 55 transgender adolescents who underwent puberty suppression followed by cross-sex hormones to induce developmental changes that match their gender identity had similar psychological outcomes in young adulthood compared to an average sample, and none regretted their decisions. This medical intervention for patients that have an adequate psychological assessment has been supported by the Pediatric Endocrine Society and the Endocrine Society since 2009.”¹⁶

The World Professional Association of Transgender Health declared in 2008 that it considers that

“sex reassignment, properly indicated and performed as provided by the Standards of Care, has proven to be beneficial and effective in the treatment of individuals with transsexualism, gender identity disorder, and/or gender dysphoria. Sex reassignment plays an undisputed role in contributing toward favorable outcomes.”¹⁷

In discussing transgender healthcare for adolescents, the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners has stated that

“hormone therapy has been demonstrated to reduce distress without significant adverse psychological or physical effects.”¹⁸

The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists states:

“For children and adolescents experiencing gender dysphoria, puberty can be a time of particularly severe emotional distress. Child and adolescent psychiatrists are the primary care managers and decision makers for this group, in collaboration with other specialists, such as paediatric endocrinologists (Australian Paediatric Endocrine Group, 2010). International consensus guidelines recommend that adolescents who fulfil eligibility and readiness criteria undergo treatment to (reversibly) suppress puberty, generally with the use of gonadotrophin releasing hormone (GnRH) analogues (Hembree et al., 2009). Current evidence suggests good outcomes associated with this approach (Wallien and Cohen-Kettenis, 2008).”¹⁹

The Australian Psychological Society (“APS”) is Australia’s largest professional psychological association of more than 22,000 licensed psychologists. The APS states:

“Given that there is no empirical evidence to support therapeutic approaches that direct transgender people to live as the gender normatively expected of the sex they were assigned at birth, attempting to do so would be counter to the guidelines outlined above. Specifically, it would not demonstrate respect for the person, and as such would likely be experienced as coercive. The available evidence supports the APS recommendation that psychologists utilise mental health practices that affirm transgender people’s experiences.”²⁰

The APS statement goes on to indicate the basis of best practice evidence-based care for transgender individuals:

“Evidence-based strategies for responding to transgender clients include (a) affirming the person’s gender; (2) Challenging negative perceptions of gender diversity amongst family members, especially with regard to children; (3) Discussing appropriate referral options for hormonal or surgical responses if desired; and (4) Advocating for the support needs of transgender and gender diverse people. These strategies are equally applicable to children and adults. Psychologists working with both groups should always be guided by the client’s expressed needs. Such an approach is in line with the APS Code of Ethics...”²¹

The Endocrine Society of Australia expressly supports affirming methods of healthcare, stating:

*"Endocrinologists are important members of the multi-disciplinary team providing care to enable these people to express their gender identity and sexuality. Gender dysphoria is a serious condition with a high risk of self harm and suicide. Treatment to suppress unwanted hormones and replace others improves quality of life and overall outcomes. Hormonal management has advanced greatly, with increasing medical awareness of the needs of transgender and intersex people leading to the evolution of recent guidelines from international Endocrine Societies regarding optimal management of transgender individuals."*²²

A statement from the Royal Children's Hospital, endorsed by the Australian and New Zealand Professional Association for Transgender Health says that:

*"Increasing evidence demonstrates that with supportive, gender affirming care during childhood and adolescence, harms can be ameliorated and mental health and wellbeing outcomes can be significantly improved."*²³

Monash Health, the largest public health service in Victoria, stated in March 2016 that:

*"There is abundant evidence showing that medical interventions aimed at aligning one's physical appearance with one's gender identity help improve quality of life and mental health."*²⁴

There exists a clear medical consensus that the current treatment protocols are clinically effective in relieving the symptoms of gender dysphoria.

4.5 Consequences of Denying Medical Treatment

The consequences of depriving appropriately evaluated transgender individuals of medical care are serious. They have been expressly articulated by the Family Court and include²⁵:

- Increased suffering of gender dysphoria through puberty, leading to increased risk of anxiety, depression, self-harm and suicide attempts;
- Complications and risks of osteoporosis arising from long term use of puberty blockers;
- Irreversible physical changes of the individual's sex during puberty, such as menses, linear growth, and vocal pitch changes; and
- Risk that the individual will illegally obtain hormones through informal channels where there is a greater risk of blood borne viruses and no medical oversight to ensure correct administration and dosage.

The serious consequences of depriving transgender youth of affirming healthcare are also reflected in epidemiological statistics. The 2017 "Trans Pathways Study" of 2016²⁶ was Australia's largest examination to date of the health and wellbeing of transgender youth. The study found that one of the risk factors for transgender youth was difficulty finding healthcare services that were able to provide affirming treatments that relieved their distress. The study also found that 42.1% of participants had reached out to a service provider who did not understand or respect their gender. In terms of health outcomes, the study found that 48% of transgender youth have attempted suicide, 80% have self-harmed, and 72% have been diagnosed with anxiety. The treatment approaches set out in the WPATH Standards of Care demonstrably improve the health metrics of those transgender youth.

4.6 Alternative Forms of Treatment

There exists no known alternative treatment approach to gender dysphoria that produces favourable outcomes.

Forms of treatment that force a transgender person (adult, adolescent or child) to deny their identity and live as the gender normatively expected of their birth sex have been empirically shown to be ineffective in relieving gender dysphoria, and moreover, often increase mental health morbidity factors including suicidality. Put into other words, conversion therapy attempts to shame a transgender person into "complying with gender stereotypes"²⁷. Conversion therapy would likely be considered medically unethical by each of Australia's main medical associations. According to the Standards of Care,

"Treatment aimed at trying to change a person's gender identity and lived gender expression to become more congruent with sex assigned at birth has been attempted in the past (Gelder & Marks, 1969; Greenson, 1964), yet without success, particularly in the long term (Cohen-Kettenis & Kuiper, 1984; Pauly, 1965). Such treatment is no longer considered ethical." ²⁸

The desistance myth²⁹ (the flawed proposition that a high proportion of transgender youth will eventually, given time, revert to the gender normatively expected of their sex at birth) also continues to proliferate in conservative anti-transgender media stories. The single study on which the claim is based was undertaken in the 1980's. Researchers have since identified serious methodological flaws in the study. It has also been repeatedly refuted by better, more recent studies with larger sample sizes. The Royal Children's Hospital Melbourne (Australia's largest pediatric hospital) gave testimonial evidence in a recent court case concerning the process of evaluating and treating gender dysphoria in youth. The Royal Children's Hospital gave evidence that, in the 14 years that the hospital has been collecting records, 96% of children treated for the management of gender dysphoria persisted into adulthood.³⁰ The evidence tendered by the Royal Children's Hospital covers a substantial patient base of more than 700 adolescents.

4.7 Transgender Australians and Society

It is difficult to accurately estimate the number of transgender Australians, because there are "no population studies that accurately account for the range of gender identities and gender expressions". Limited data from the The Williams Institute in the United States suggests that between 0.3% and 0.5% of the population is transgender.³¹ Without adequate population data, it is incredibly difficult to gauge the magnitude of social issues faced by transgender people. However, social intolerance is often the root cause of distress and health crises in the transgender community.

4.7.1 Social Intolerance

Abuse, discrimination and bullying are examples of anti-social behaviours that isolate transgender people from society. Data collected by the Australian Human Rights Commission in 2012 reveals the 47% of transgender men and 37% of transgender women experience verbal abuse.³² Data collected by the TransPathways Survey in Western Australia found that 89% of Australian transgender youth were rejected by their peers.³³ 74% experienced bullying. 69% of youth had experienced discrimination and 22% had been kicked out of the family home or experienced accommodation issues. GLAAD, which monitors levels of social tolerance towards LGBTI communities, observed a "swift and alarming erosion of acceptance" of LGBTI individuals in 2017. A survey conducted by Harris Poll (n=2100) showed that less than 27% of respondents would be comfortable learning that their doctor or child's teacher is LGBTI.³⁴ A 2014 research report originating in America concluded that the average life expectancy of a transgender woman is 35 years.³⁵

In NSW, 32% of transgender people experienced humiliating or offensive comments, images or videos posted about them online without their consent.³⁶

Across all of Australia, data collected by Beyond Blue, Curtin University and the Western Australia Centre for Health showed that experiences of discrimination and harassment are common amongst transgender Australians. Nearly two thirds of participants (64.8%) reported at least one instance, with experiences ranging from social exclusion to violence and assault. Many participants reported changing their behaviour for fear of being subject to further instances.

4.7.2 Violence

Only limited data has been collected about violence and hate crimes experienced by transgender Australians. The Private Lives 2 Survey found already high rates of abuse, harassment and violence towards gay and bisexual Australians, however rates of almost all types of abuse were significantly higher for transgender men and transgender women in the survey, and even higher again for respondents who chose "other" as their gender identity.³⁷

A Queensland study undertaken in 2010 found that 38% of transgender women and 9% of transgender men reported being physically attacked with a weapon such as a knife, bottle, or rock.³⁸

Data collected in the UK shows that 41% of transgender adults have experienced a hate crime in the last 12 months.³⁹ The number increases to 53% when dealing with transgender youth. The report, prepared by Stonewall and titled "LGBTI in Britain: Trans Report" also found that 79% of transgender individuals did not report hate crimes to the police for fear of further discrimination from police or the justice system.⁴⁰

4.7.3 Poverty and Unemployment

Social intolerance leads to poor socio-economic outcomes for transgender individuals. Studies performed in the USA indicate that transgender individuals are between 400% and 500% more likely to be living below the poverty line than the general population.⁴¹ Unemployment rates are high in the transgender community because intolerance and discrimination act as barriers to transgender individuals obtaining and maintaining meaningful employment. Beyond Blue, Curtin University and the Western Australian Centre for Health surveyed more than 900 transgender individuals and found that, "participants had difficulty securing employment, and some reported losing their job after announcing their intention to transition, or during the transition process. Some participants resigned from work because their peers made life unbearable for them."⁴²

4.7.4 Domestic Violence

Transgender individuals are also particularly vulnerable to the effects of domestic violence. The limited data available from ACON indicates that between 60-80% of transgender Australians have experienced domestic or family violence at some stage in their life.⁴³

4.7.5 Socio-economic Health

Transgender individuals are grossly over-represented in socio-economic health issues. A 2016 inter-agency report of the United Nations found that, on average, 20% of transgender women in developed economies were living with HIV.⁴⁴ International studies also show very high rates of STI's and alcohol and drug dependency amongst transgender populations.

Lack of employment opportunities and "systemic, institutional, and interpersonal discrimination" forces many transgender women into sex work as the only viable means of survival.⁴⁵ According to the Centre for Disease Control in the USA, "transgender sex workers with a history of homelessness, unemployment, incarceration, mental health issues, violence, emotional, physical, or sexual abuse, or drug use" are further at risk of being trapped in a cycle of poverty. "Lack of economic opportunities outside of the sex work industry and discrimination may lead to transgender people [entering sex work] in order to generate income for rent, drugs, medicines, hormones, or gender-related surgeries."⁴⁶ Transgender sex workers also earn a lower average income than other sex workers and often work in riskier conditions.

4.7.6 Mental Health

Minority stress and social intolerance takes a toll on the mental health of transgender Australians. The LGBTI Health Alliance of Australia reports that 53% of transgender people above the age of 18 have self-harmed⁴⁷, while the Trans Pathways Survey shows that 80% of Australian transgender youth have self-harmed.⁴⁸ Suicide ideation amongst transgender adults and is 18 times higher than the general population.⁴⁹ Amongst Australian transgender youth, more than 48% have attempted suicide.⁵⁰

The specific mental health needs and experiences of transgender people were also outlined in "Tranznation: A report on the health and wellbeing of transgender people in Australia and New Zealand".⁵¹ This study found that the rate of depression was much higher among transgender people than in the general Australian population. Transgender women and other trans people who were assigned male at birth were twice as likely to experience depression as trans men and other trans people who were assigned female at birth. Two thirds of participants reported modifying their activities due to fear of stigma or discrimination. Of considerable concern was that one in four respondents reported suicidal thoughts in the two weeks before they completed the survey.

The Private Lives 2 report⁵² identified that transgender respondents were considerably more likely than cisgender respondents to experience episodes of intense anxiety over the past 12 months, with transgender men nearly 2.5 times more likely than cisgender men.

The First Australian National Trans Mental Health Study⁵³ surveyed more than 900 transgender Australians and found that, “over half of participants (57.2%) had been diagnosed with depression at some point in their lives.” Almost 40% had been diagnosed with an anxiety disorder at some time.

Most major mental health organisations attribute poor mental health in the transgender community to social rejection and intolerance.⁵⁴ In societies and cultures where transgender people are well accepted, their mental health, on average, mirrors that of the general population.

5. Research Methodology

Throughout the course of the analysis period, print publications were routinely collected and analysed. Fee-for-service digital print services such as PressReader and ProQuest were used to monitor print publications to identify as many print articles as possible involving transgender Australians.

Google’s web indexing capability was leveraged to identify and locate as many online news articles as possible involving transgender Australians. The search criteria was restricted to Australian websites, and articles published between 1 January 2016 and 31 December 2017. Searches were repeated in both ‘Google Web Verbatim’ mode and ‘Google News’ modes whilst using the search de-personalisation tag. Search terms were selected based on our understanding of terms expected to return results relevant to transgender Australians. Google’s word proximity search tool was also leveraged to identify further articles. A thesaurus was used to help identify suitable terms and search expressions were fully developed and documented.

Results were then narrowed to the 27 most common publishers that are bound by the journalistic code set out by the Australian Press Council:

Adelaide Now	490 articles
Brisbane Times	295 articles
Canberra Times	430 articles
Courier Mail	490 articles
Daily Mail	500 articles
Daily Telegraph	494 articles
Financial Review	95 articles
Geelong Advertiser	106 articles
Gold Coast Bulletin	133 articles
Herald Sun	241 articles
Huffington Post	237 articles
Mumbrella	20 articles
New Matilda	20 articles
news.com.au	505 articles
nine.com.au	142 articles
NT News	208 articles
Perth Now	174 articles
Star Observer	160 articles
Sydney Morning Herald	464 articles
The Age	421 articles
The Australian	174 articles
The Guardian	476 articles
The Mercury	133 articles
The New Daily	62 articles
Townsville Bulletin	52 articles
WA Today	321 articles
West Australian	53 articles

Data mining tools were used to data-scrape the search results into tables of actionable URI's. Articles were electronically sorted by publisher, and (video or photo only) articles that contained no text in the article body were discarded.

CMS markup and syntax analysis was manually performed and parsing templates were developed for each of the major CMS types used by publishers. By routing each of the URI's through the relevant parsing template, a full database was constructed of the text of all 6,896 articles published within the given date range. The full list of all articles analysed is contained in Appendix A.

At the conclusion of the analysis period, the dataset was inspected for integrity. The entire database of articles was subsequently uploaded into secure cloud storage and injected into Google's natural language processor for semantic and sentiment analysis. Google's natural language processor uses mass cloud computing and machine learning networks to derive insights and identify relationships from unstructured text. Among other things, it identifies entities, extracts key phrases, evaluates the positive or negative sentiment of text, and evaluates strength of emotion. Google has one of the largest and most evolved "natural language" artificial intelligence processors in the world.

A number of key phrases were selected for language analysis based on their expected probability of delivering insights into the state of media reporting. Average sentiment and magnitude of emotion were analysed against numerous variables, including publisher, time, article type and frequency of particular terms.

One limitation with this approach is that computerised "natural language" analysis tools are currently limited to measuring tone and positive and negative emotion on the face of the text. Tools are not sufficiently mature to understand more sophisticated nuances of language such as sarcasm, double entendres or nonce words. Similarly, natural language tools do not understand or evaluate context. Accordingly, our research was limited to measuring semantics, tone and sentiment.

Our quantitative analysis also delivered good insights into issues of balance and fairness, as well the incidence of derogatory and prejudicial language. Semantic and entity analysis also revealed that particular anti-transgender medical professionals and medical associations were given dominant coverage in the press.

Deeper analysis was then performed using qualitative techniques to critically examine issues of gratuitous emphasis, factual errors, or articles that were misleading by omission. A number of questionable claims made in articles were tested against the statements of eminent medical associations.

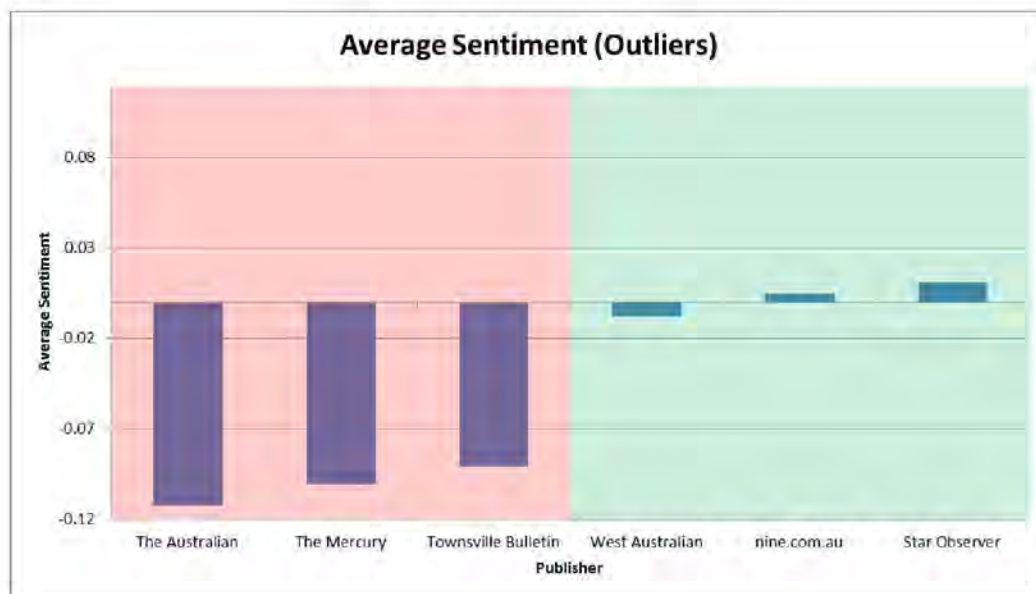

6. Results

6.1 Sentiment Analysis

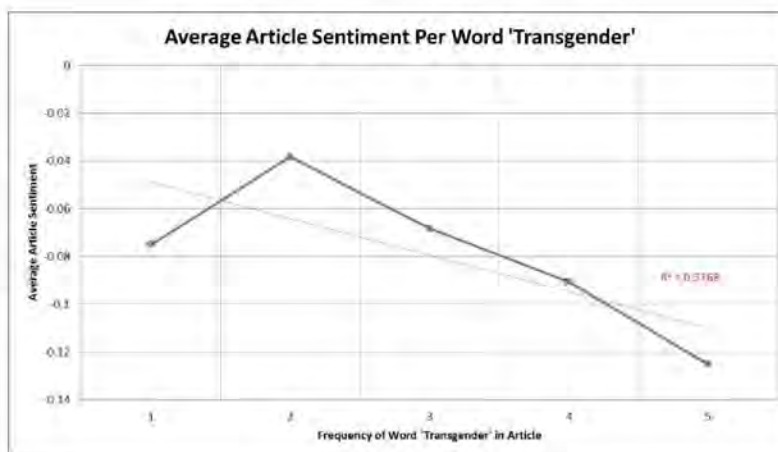

Google's natural language processor analysed the sentiment and emotion of each article independently, as well as the sentiment and emotion of each article's headline.

The sentiment analysis found an overall negative bias towards transgender Australians in the press. A total of 3,527 articles mentioning transgender Australians had a negative sentiment, while only 804 had a positive sentiment. Most publishers published significantly more negative articles than positive ones. The strongest negative sentiment came from The Australian.

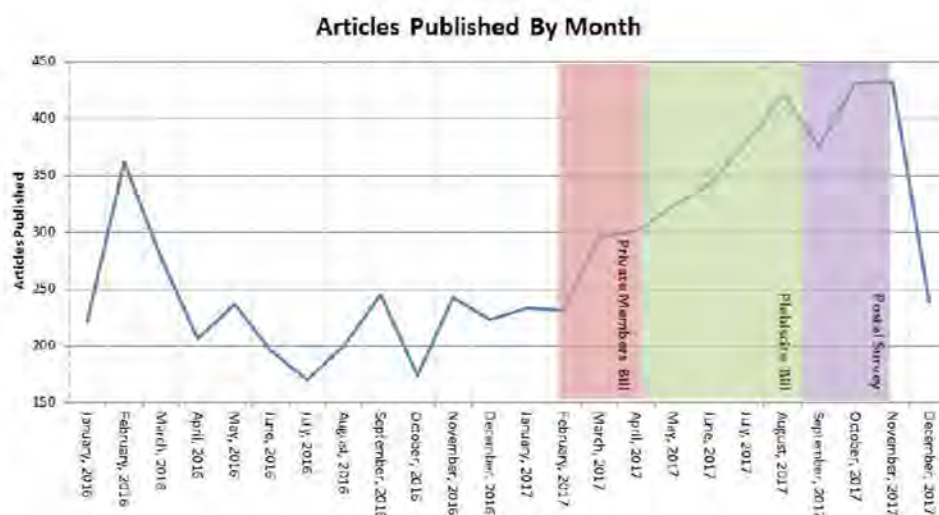

The highest (average) sentiment was attributed to articles published in the West Australian, nine.com.au, and the Star Observer. The lowest (average) sentiment was attributed to The Australian, The Mercury and the Townsville Bulletin. The average negative sentiment observed in The Australian was 9.9x stronger than the positive sentiment observed in the Star Observer.

Article sentiment was also analysed against the frequency of individual terms. Of particular concern was a strong inverse correlation ($r^2=0.58$) between the frequency of the term “transgender” in an article and that article’s sentiment. In general, the more frequent the word “transgender” was in an article, the lower the sentiment. In other words, articles that focused most on transgender people and issues had the lowest sentiment.

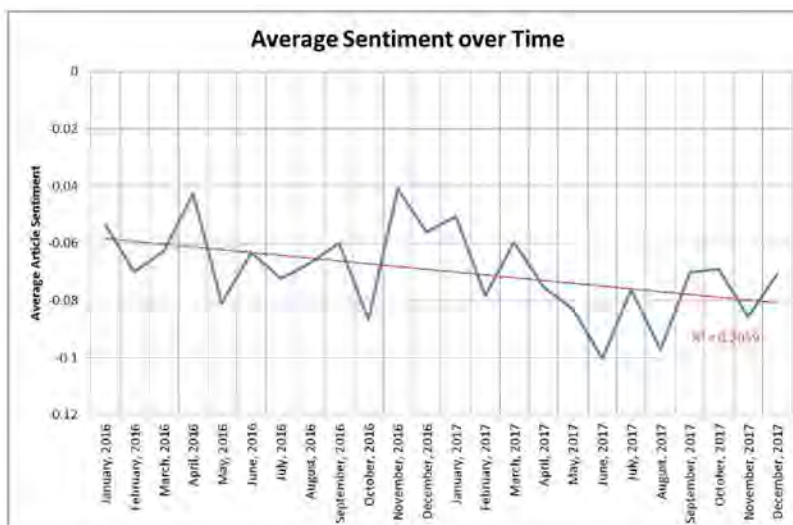

Public events (such as a celebrity coming out as transgender or the public disclosure of a hate crime) can often precipitate public conversation and press coverage of transgender issues. We analysed the frequency of publication of articles covering transgender people and issues over time to see whether particular events had a significant impact on media reporting in 2016 and 2017. A significant increase in press discourse of transgender issues was observed between March and November 2017. We note that this coincided with the public debate around same-sex marriage. A slightly stronger overall negative sentiment was also observed during this period.

Some newspapers have a much greater circulation and audience reach than others, and accordingly have a much greater ability to influence the public perception of transgender Australians. We obtained readership data from Roy Morgan Research for the year leading up to 30-September 2017. The aggregate Monday to Saturday readership was evaluated against average sentiment for each publisher with a view to determining whether any connection could be inferred between readership and publisher sentiment. We found that publishers with greater readership had, on average, lower sentiment. However, the correlation was very weak.

Public perception and press bias are understood to change over time. We analysed how both frequency of articles and sentiment changed over time. Rainbow Rights Watch was particularly concerned to see the average sentiment of all articles discussing transgender people and issues trending even further negative over time.

To better understand the cause of such strong negative sentiment, we performed a qualitative analysis of some articles and how they affected transgender people. Our qualitative analysis uncovered systemic issues relating to prejudicial language, gratuitous emphasis, issues of balance and fairness, factual errors and misrepresentations, and derogatory language and slurs in the articles analysed.

6.2 Prejudicial Language

Rainbow Rights Watch identified a number of prejudicial terms which may have contributed to an overall negative sentiment. Prejudice refers to a negative evaluation or feelings towards a particular class of people that is not based on actual experience or evidence. Prejudicial language towards transgender people usually takes the form of language that undermines their dignity by casting them as inferior, imprudent with decisions around health and fertility, or less intelligent than people of other genders.

Our analysis identified a number of key prejudicial terms which occurred with high frequency in articles discussing transgender Australians:

6.2.1 The Term "Confused"

The word "confused" suggests a person lacks the intelligence or cognitive capacity to understand their own experiences or the world around them. There exists no credible evidence to support the claim that transgender people are lacking in intelligence or awareness as compared to the general population.

We observed 312 instances in which the word "confused" was employed in articles discussing transgender Australians during the two year period of analysis. In addition to its use in the body of articles, the term also appeared with very high frequency in public comments. The majority of instances occurred in opinion pieces, with transgender Australians frequently being referred to as "gender confused" or "sexually confused". Overall, articles that contained variations on the word "confused" had a 7% lower sentiment than those that did not.

Many of the articles using the word "confused" were inflammatory. For example, in April 2017, the Daily Telegraph published an opinion piece which referred to the "alphabetical jumble of the gender confused in their pursuit of the destruction.." Another article published by the Daily Telegraph in September 2016 asked, "...is it any wonder that the number of children confused about their sex has exploded?" A 2016 Daily Telegraph opinion piece claimed that the Safe Schools anti-bullying program "was all about LGBTI and supporting students who are gender-confused." In January 2016, a patronising Daily Telegraph opinion columnist favoured Carlotta Byron over Cate McGregor for Australian of the year because Ms Byron offered "more soothing words to the gender confused" than McGregor. Paraphrasing The Australian newspaper, the piece continued to discussed candidate David Morrison as "...the man who had been of such assistance to the sexually confused."

In April 2017, an article published by nine.com.au opened with the claim "A growing number of Australian children confused about sexuality are identifying as transgender."

In July 2017, Daily Mail Australia published an article that claimed "Soaring numbers of children are being sent to specialists because they are confused about their gender". In September 2017, another Daily Mail news article covering school dress codes stated "...pupils confused about their gender will now no longer have to decide [how to dress]." Another Daily Mail Australia news article claimed in October 2017 that "...teenagers are putting their problems down to confusion over their gender after being brainwashed". In April 2017, a Daily Telegraph article uncritically quoted a questionable claim that "Most children grow out of gender confusion." A Daily Mail Australia opinion article published in October 2017 opposed the provision of fertility preservation treatments for transgender individuals, asking readers "...the thorny ethical question of whether the NHS should be freezing the sperm of confused schoolboys..." Another Daily Mail article, published in January 2017 made the misleading claim that "80 per cent of gender-confused people never have sex change treatment."

Amongst all the articles analysed, we were unable to identify any credible evidence of confusion or lower intelligence amongst transgender Australians as compared to the general population. This is significant because the common law defence of "fair comment" or "honest opinion" to an allegation of defamation or vilification requires an otherwise defamatory opinion to be based on "true or privileged facts stated or referred to with sufficient clarity in the published material."⁵⁵

Several complaints were lodged with the Australian Press Council during 2017 by transgender Australians concerned about being unreasonably and persistently referred to as "confused". The Press Council deemed that such language, even when used repeatedly and in conjunction with other demeaning phrases, was not sufficiently prejudicial to warrant intervention.

6.2.2 The Term "Child Abuse"

During the period of analysis, we observed a high frequency of articles using the term "child abuse" to refer to the administration of best practice medical care to transgender adolescents of Australia. The term "child abuse" means "physical maltreatment or sexual molestation of a child," according to the Oxford English Dictionary.⁵⁶

We observed 82 instances of the term "child abuse" in articles discussing transgender Australians. Articles containing the term "child abuse" had an 82% lower sentiment than those that did not. Articles that used the term "child abuse" more than once had a 191% lower sentiment than those articles that did not contain the term.

Notwithstanding the fact that the current treatment protocols are guided by the symptoms of the individual and do not favour any particular gender identity or surgical outcome, in April 2016 the Daily Telegraph opined in a full page piece in both print and online, -that "forcing [adolescents] down an irreversible path of gender reassignment surgery looks like child abuse to me."

The Daily Telegraph and the Courier Mail also uncritically repeated claims connecting transgender healthcare with child abuse frequently throughout 2016 and 2017. In September 2017, the Courier Mail repeated the claim "It's effectively child abuse" in relation to the current treatment protocols. In November 2016, the Courier Mail and the Daily Telegraph also repeated the claim that providing evidence based healthcare to Australian transgender youth is a "fashion in child surgical abuse." In April 2017, the Daily Telegraph again repeated the claim that administering hormonal medical care to transgender youth is -"effectively 'child abuse... [a] massive intrusion into the minds and bodies of children'". In September 2017, the Daily Telegraph yet again repeated the claim that the medical treatment protocols for adolescent gender dysphoria amounts to a “fashion in child surgical abuse.” Another Daily Telegraph article, published in April 2017 restated the dubious allegation that the medical profession was forcing transgender individuals into surgery, repeating its earlier claim that “forcing [adolescents] down an irreversible path of gender reassignment surgery looks like child abuse.” A Daily Mail Australia article published in November 2017 paraphrased another conservative British newspaper, saying that, in future, “we may wonder if this was progress or child abuse.”

In December 2017, the Daily Telegraph published an online opinion article that contained a sound clip of an extended interview between the article’s author and a transgender woman. The author invited the interview guest to agree with the claim that administering hormonal interventions to transgender youth “is child abuse”. Part of the guest’s response contained the assertion that transgender adolescents should “turn into human beings” before being granted access to medical care. Whilst both the journalist and the guest are free to hold those views, and Australians are entitled to be exposed to a range of views on such issues, it is unfortunate that there was no article published in a similar location in the publication presenting the alternative viewpoint that (a) transgender individuals, including transgender youth, are human and deserving of equal access to healthcare; (b) that such medical treatment has a demonstrated and proven benefit in relieving suffering, and (c) that denying treatment substantially elevates the risk of poor health outcomes and suicide.

On various occasions, a number of individuals complained to the Australian Press Council expressing concern about the effect on Australian transgender youth of having their parents and medical practitioners implicated as child abusers. Some complaints were dismissed because they fell outside the 30-day window. On other complaints, the Press Council concluded that the term ‘child abuse’, even when used repeatedly, in concert with other prejudicial language and in conjunction with misleading information about medical treatment, was not so prejudicial as to “likely constitute a breach” of journalistic standards, even when no balancing viewpoint or opportunity of reply had been offered.

6.2.3 The Term “Mutilation”

Variations on the word “mutilation” were often used by journalists to express a moral condemnation towards properly evaluated Australians who undergo mastectomy or sex reassignment surgery to relieve the symptoms of dysphoria. The word ‘mutilate’ means to “inflict a violent or disfiguring injury on another person”, according to the Oxford English Dictionary.⁵⁷ A number of transgender Australians have questioned why it is acceptable to refer to transgender individuals in such a way when it would be offensive and highly distasteful to use the same language to refer to a person who has undergone a mastectomy, orchiectomy, or hysterectomy to treat any other serious medical condition.

Variations of the word “mutilated” occurred 26 times in the main body of articles. Articles that contained variations of the word “mutilated” had a sentiment that was 72% lower than those articles that did not contain any such word.

The Daily Telegraph published an article in May 2016 which asked readers whether they were “[t]roubled by the growing movement encouraging gender-confused children to undergo mutilation in order to find peace with themselves?” In September 2017, the Daily Telegraph published an opinion piece on transgender adolescents titled “What Madness Can Justify Mutilating Our Children?”

In April 2016, the Daily Telegraph repeated the highly dubious claims made by an American anti-LGBTI lobby group that providing care for transgender adolescents commits them to a “lifetime of carcinogenic and otherwise toxic cross-sex hormones, and likely [to] consider unnecessary surgical mutilation of their healthy body parts.”

Paraphrasing another organisation in February 2016, a Daily Mail Australia piece claimed that “male-to-female transgender people, such as former Olympian Bruce Jenner, are not real women but mutilated males.”

A book review published in July 2017 claimed that the book that was the subject of review examined “what would bring a person to the point of wishing physical mutilation upon himself – or, sometimes, herself.”

Variations on the term mutilated were also observed with high frequency in public comment sections of opinion articles :

So the court thinks mutilation is an appropriate treatment for a mental disorder. Medicare will pick up the bill no doubt. Strange times indeed.

Society has got to the stage where certain minority groups believe that they, and only they, know how to solve the so called problems of the world and anyone who has an opposing view is out of step - how can anyone in their right mind believe that they can adequately diagnose a 4 or 5 year old as transgender? - in the whole scheme of things is it not better to suffer a few possible suicides than to mutilate our kids in the name of trying to solve some alleged problem not yet clearly defined and analysed - when a person turns 18 let them make up their own mind

Amazing how the average Aussie seems to be deluded into thinking there is some substance to this Leftie nonsense. Even The Australian is happy to call Catherine McGregor "she" in spite of the fact that this is a male person. Biological sex cannot be changed by medical and surgical "treatment" i.e. mutilation. Facts should be respected and what we write and say should reflect this.

This is a bizarre story and raises many questions about the parents, the psychological assessment and treatment of the child and the right of the Family Court to approve what is effectively mutilation of a minor.

To all the serving or retired men and women from the ADF who have written comments below, expressing disgust + dismay at this disgraceful social engineering in an otherwise magnificent Institution, may I say...

.... THANK YOU FOR YOUR SERVICE!!!

My Australian Grandad was the Captain of a Lancaster Bomber in WW2, awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross.

British Grandma was a plane engineer in the British Airforce, who met Grandad when assigned to maintain his plane.

I have enormous respect for the sacrifices made by our military, and the strength of character, mind + physicality required for it.

Transgender people don't cut it.

When you have gender dysphoria, unable to accept the most basic of scientific fact that you are immutably a female or male from birth - and no surgical mutilation or hormone injections can change that - you're not suitable for the military, a unified ferocious fighting team, focussed on destroying the enemy.

This is criminal. Confused children and teenagers now being used as guinea pigs to fulfill some very questionable idea of gender diversity. So what happens to these poor souls once irreversible mutilation has taken place but in their maturity they realise they made a terrible mistake?

Barbara

If Gender Dysphoria is left untreated 98% of boys and 88% of girls will accept their biological sex at the end of puberty. Allowing children to be treated with hormones that can have lethal side-effects and to have mutilating surgery is child abuse.

6.2.4 The Term “Chopped”

The word “chopped” is sometimes used in the media as slang to refer to the process of sex reassignment surgery. The word is generally offensive amongst transgender people as it oversimplifies the complex process of reconstructing a person’s sex organs. The word “chopped” also has a violent and impulsive connotation which is contradictory to the therapeutic nature of genital reconstructive surgery.

In January 2017, the Daily Telegraph published an opinion piece that referred to a transgender woman accused of a violent crime. The opening sentence read, “Having been chopped herself, Sydney tranny Evie Amati allegedly sought to share the experience.” An opinion piece published by the Herald Sun in January 2016 paraphrased the “...longstanding view [of Germaine Greer] that chopping off your member and taking hormones doesn’t make you a woman.”

6.2.5 The Term “Delusional”

The word “delusional” is descriptive of an individual who possesses faulty judgement or “idiosyncratic beliefs or impressions that are contradicted by reality.”⁵⁸ It is both a medical term of art and a term of general vernacular. There is no credible evidence that transgender Australians have faulty judgement as compared to the general population. Transgender Australians are painfully aware of reality as it pertains to their primary and secondary sex characteristics. Their impressions of their own bodies, whilst distressing to them, do not deviate from reality.

We observed 30 instances of variations of the word “delusional” in the body of articles. The word delusional occurred frequently in opinion pieces, where it was sometimes used as a negative qualifier targeting transgender Australians, as it has been in the past to target gay and lesbian Australians. The word was also observed with high frequency in the public comments sections. Articles that contained variations on the word “delusional” had a 155% lower sentiment than those articles that did not.

For example, a column published by the Daily Telegraph in May 2016 which compared a transgender individual with a notorious Australian who defrauded the medical system and the media by falsely claiming to have cancer, stated that “Gibson may represent the line at which acceptance of delusion is drawn.”

Another article published in July 2017 claimed that doctors were “fortifying gender delusion...” by providing medical care to transgender individuals.

Numerous instances of the word “delusional” were also used to reference transgender people in public comments published by The Australian:

Peter

Delusional and ridiculous. More awkward ugly bureaucratic twisting of language in the name of pretentious outlandish social engineering.

John

I work in Mental Health and we have a term for most of the 'trans' people and it's called delusional.

It is often accompanied by forms of psychosis.

Rob 379

I hope these school kids snap out of the delusional world they are coming from when they go out into the real world. I fear though that those that become Teachers will simply keep the farce going. And those that become politicians will laugh all the way to the bank - forever.

Rainbow Rights Watch is of the view that the word “delusional” is hazardously close to the threshold for vilification. In some States of Australia, language which incites “serious contempt” towards transgender individuals can trigger vilification proceedings.⁵⁹ Rainbow Rights Watch is of the view that public comments that unjustifiably refer to transgender Australians as “delusional” are potentially vilifying and should be moderated by the publisher.

6.2.6 Whole Articles Dedicated to Prejudice

In our observations, prejudice was not limited to particular phrases or passages. We observed whole articles dedicated to ridiculing the appearance of transgender Australians or implicitly challenging their right to participate in society.

In June 2016, the Daily Telegraph published a mean spirited but rambling article originally titled “I saw a man in a dress and he looked ridiculous.” The article, published in an opinion section, recollected the author’s encounter of a transgender or gender non-conforming individual, saying “I tried not to appear shocked — after all, nobody around me was. But honestly, he looked ridiculous.” The article continued “And a great big hairy mountain of a man in a tea dress is just, well, too much for me.” The article, which may have been amended since its original publication, specified with some precision where the transgender individual was seen. In all likelihood, the article contributed to social inequity by legitimising, and even sanctioning, the peer rejection and ridicule of transgender individuals. Unfortunately, no balancing article or rebuttal was published in the same section of the newspaper offering a viewpoint on the dignity of transgender and gender non-conforming individuals, or the importance of all Australians being able to freely express themselves through their choices in clothing without fear of ridicule or reprisal.

Another article, published by the Daily Telegraph in October 2016, contained the opinion of a writer who had encountered a transgender woman whilst accompanying her child to the supermarket checkout. The article, on its most obvious construction, implied that transgender women should not participate in society (or perhaps employment) because the writer had difficulty finding the language to explain the concept to her child. In claiming that the topic was too complex, the author opined, “There aren’t enough words out there and if there are, they’re too constructed, too academic, too hard.... I’ve had enough. Let’s not deconstruct childhood.” The article followed a very clear “us and them” segregationist narrative that set transgender people apart from the rest of society. The passage “Let’s not deconstruct childhood”, which was also repeated in the article’s headline, subtly implied that the participation of transgender Australians in society somehow corrupts the innocence and sensitivity of children. The article was, in all likelihood, unnecessarily hurtful to the transgender individual who was its subject. Unfortunately, no balancing article or rebuttal was published in the same section of the newspaper setting out the equal opportunity rationale of allowing transgender Australians to participate fully in society, or offering ideas about how to explain the existence of transgender individuals to children in simple language.

6.2.7 Language Inciting Moral Panic

Our analysis identified sustained and repeated use of language with the effect, if not the intention, of inciting public anxiety or alarm by portraying transgender Australians as a threat to the moral fabric of society. The tone and rhetoric of many articles was strikingly reminiscent of the “gay moral panic” articles published in the 1980’s that sustained and incited violence and hatred towards gay Australians.

Numerous articles were observed in which transgender Australians were accused of “destroying free speech” merely by expressing a preference for the pronoun by which they would like to be addressed. Anti-discrimination policies intended to curb the gross rates of abuse, social dispossession and discrimination faced by transgender Australians were portrayed as intimidatory, obsessive, totalitarian, distracting from “real” issues, or somehow muzzling free speech. The term “political correctness”, frequently used by conservative writers as an epithet to express disdain for non-discrimination measures, was detected in nearly 5% of all articles discussing transgender people and issues. The phrase “political correctness gone mad” was seen in 24 articles and lowered the sentiment of those articles by 82%. An incredible 137 articles that mentioned transgender people or issues (nearly 2% in total) contained references to “Marxism”.

Expressions of authors’ distrust were also unusually high in articles discussing transgender Australians. The term “so-called”, often used as a qualifier to express disagreement or distrust over a following phrase or concept, was detected in 329 articles. Articles containing the term “so-called” had a sentiment 47% lower than articles that did not. Common usage of the qualifier “so-called” was to precede terms such as “male body”, “transition”, “transgender”, “anti-bullying program”, and “Safe Schools”.

Most academics and scientists would consider it a matter of incontrovertible fact that people exist who experience dissonance between their gender identity and biological sex characteristics. Similarly, most medical professionals would consider it a matter of accepted medical fact that social and medical transition eases or eliminates the symptoms of gender dysphoria. Yet in media discourse, these concepts were often subjugated to a mere “theory”. The term “radical gender theory” occurred in 15 articles discussing transgender issues. Those articles had a 24% lower sentiment than articles that did not contain the term.

Many articles even portrayed transgender people as blameworthy. An article published in the Daily Mail in November 2017 contained the headline “Transgender Zealots are Destroying Truth Itself” before also blaming transgender individuals for the moral collapse of society, dramatically claiming that our “whole moral and social system is being destroyed.” In April 2017, the Daily Telegraph claimed that the administration of evidence-based medical treatment to individuals experiencing gender dysphoria amounted to a “permissiveness which threatens to destroy social norms and the boundaries of commonsense.” The article continued, referring to a “pernicious social fad for transgenderism [sic]”. The word “pernicious” means “causing insidious harm or ruin” or alternatively “evil, or wicked”. Another article published in the Daily Telegraph in April 2017, claimed that “incalculable damage” had been done by teaching adolescents about the existence of gender diverse people. The article also made equivalent claims about “untold damage”. A further article, published by the Herald Sun in October 2016, paraphrased the claim made by Camille Paglia that “Transgenderism [sic] in the West is a symptom of decadence and cultural collapse.”

As sensationalist, offensive, fear-mongering and objectionable as the above claims are, we believe the writers are entitled to hold such views. However, Rainbow Rights Watch is of the view that Australians are entitled to be exposed to a range of opinions and a fair contest of ideas. Journalistic balance and providing a counter-opinion is critical when publishing offensive, insensitive and objectionable content that has consequences for the wellbeing of Australians. We note that no counter-opinion was offered to readers of the above articles with similar prominence and location that (a) transgender Australians are a natural and healthy part of the diverse human fabric; (b) that the existence of transgender Australians enriches society rather than erodes it; and (c) that transgender individuals have existed, albeit in secrecy, repression and shame, for many generations.

Another article, published by The Australian in October 2017, sensationally claimed that women were becoming so distressed by the presence of transwomen who did not, in their subjective judgement, sufficiently conform to a stereotypically female appearance in female bathrooms and accommodations, that these women “end up getting changed in a broom cupboard.” Contradictorily, the article (and several others printed by the same publication) went on to criticise transgender women for seeking out medical interventions to feminise their appearance. Regrettably, no article was published presenting the wide body of evidence showing that transgender women are much more likely to be the victims of violence in bathrooms than the perpetrator of it.

We observed very few articles discussing transgender people in human terms, recognising character qualities such as kindness, care, empathy, charity, integrity, intelligence, or family. Rather, most articles defined transgender Australians by their gender, as if this was the most important aspect of their existence. Bodily objectification was extreme in many publications. An article published in the Daily Mail in May 2017 was headlined “Transgender man finally loses his virginity four years after having a GBP60k bionic penis fitted”. Another article published in the Daily Mail in January 2016 was headlined “Transgender surgery addict spends GBP52000 on four boob jobs two rounds of lipo and 150 face fillers to have ‘the perfect female body’”. The same individual was the subject of articles in Adelaide Now, Courier Mail, Daily Telegraph, and the Geelong Advertiser in January 2016. The article was headlined “Transgender woman spent $108,000 on surgery to look perfect”.

We detected significantly more articles pandering to the public curiosity over the process of medical transition than discussing the serious social issues facing transgender Australians. An article titled “Transgender woman to sell ‘virginity’ to pay for sex change”, which was published in the Courier Mail and the Herald Sun in September 2016, discussed a woman who was engaged in sex work to pay for sex reassignment surgery. The article focused on the salacious details of sex and surgery rather than the social structures of oppression that force many transwomen into choosing dangerous sex work as the only available means of obtaining vital medical care - and often, as a means of mere survival in a hostile society.

6.3 Gratuitous Emphasis

Qualitative analysis showed numerous examples of concerning articles that placed a high degree of emphasis on the transgender status of a person. Salacious coverage of a person's transgender status was most frequent when the individual was accused of a crime or other morally reprehensible conduct.

In a social climate where transgender Australians are often perceived as "different" and apart from the rest of society, articles that place unnecessary emphasis on a person's transgender status can conflate issues of conduct and gender identity in the mind of the reader, which ultimately sustains stigma and prejudice against the whole of the transgender community. It can also unnecessarily violate an individual's reasonable expectation of medical privacy.

Nevertheless, there are times when reporting on a person's transgender status is in the public interest and unavoidably necessary to give meaning to the story. The Style Manual of the New York Times⁶⁰ states that a journalist should:

"Cite a person's transgender status only when it is pertinent to the story and its pertinence is obvious to the reader. Unless a former name is newsworthy or pertinent, use the name and pronoun preferred by the transgender person."

Similarly, the eminent news agency Associated Press, which has news bureaus in more than 100 countries and articles syndicated off-wire in more than 1,700 newspapers, advises its writers:

*"Identify people as transgender only if pertinent and use the name by which they live publicly."*⁶¹

Unfortunately, our analysis suggests a trend of salacious reporting where the details included about a transgender person's body, or medical treatment, are entirely impertinent and disproportionate to any conceivable public interest.

For example, the Daily Telegraph published a news article in October 2016 profiling a Sydney athlete attending a high school sports reunion. The individual happened to be transgender. The opening sentence made a lurid, needless and prurient reference to the woman's genitals, saying "They may be floating in a jar at home, but sex-change athlete Caroline Layt says she still has the balls to take on all-comers at her school reunion sports day." Rainbow Rights Watch spoke to the individual who was the subject of the article. She found the reference insulting and unnecessary.

Court requests for medical care are one way in which journalists sometimes justify reporting salacious and prurient details about an accused transgender person's body or gender transition. Hormonal medications are a medically necessary form of healthcare, particularly amongst transgender individuals whose endocrine systems do not naturally secrete endogenous sex hormones. Accordingly, transgender individuals in custody sometimes have little option but to disclose their transgender status in open court to obtain access to medically necessary hormonal treatments. The public interest purpose of administering healthcare to detainees may then be exploited by a journalist to justify reporting salacious details about the person's body, genital tissue, breast tissue, medical history, former name, and former appearance, even though such details bear little relevance to the request for treatment. These very personal details often seem grossly out of proportion to the public interest purpose.

Prison housing arrangements are another way in which journalists can sometimes justify reporting salacious and prurient details about a transgender person's body or gender transition. There is a legitimate public interest purpose in reporting on where transgender detainees are housed in gender segregated prison accommodations. A journalist will often use this public interest purpose as a wedge to justify reporting otherwise gratuitous details about the person's appearance, medical history, gender transition, genitals, breasts, and former name, even when none of this information is relevant to the process by which the prison authority makes housing decisions.

6.4 Press Council Adjudications #1707 and #1709

The Daily Telegraph published a news article in January 2017 profiling a transgender woman alleged to have committed a violent attack in a Sydney suburb. The article, titled "Woman Accused Of Terrifying 7-Eleven Axe Attack Is Transgender Unionist Once Known As Karl" gave significant coverage to the individual's transgender status throughout the entire article including the headline. It comprised 33 sentences, of which 17 sentences profiled the woman's background. Of those 17 sentences, 15 made reference to her transgender status, former name, and medical treatment for gender transition. The headline of the article omitted the woman's current and legal name and instead referred to her former male name. Within the body of the article, the woman's former name was referenced on five separate occasions. The article included six photos of the woman prior to her gender transition, and only two historical photos after transition.

The Daily Mail also covered the incident with the headline "Transgender woman, 24, accused of bludgeoning two innocent people with an axe at 7-Eleven was born as a boy named Karl - but had a sex change two years ago in Thailand to become Evie." The article included details about the woman's genitals, history of sex reassignment surgery - including where the surgery had been performed - as well as information about the feminising effects of her hormonal treatments. The article included a photo of her in hospital recovering from genital reconstruction surgery, employed inappropriate pronouns, and used the problematic terms "pre" and "post-sex change operation", contrary to the advice provided in many Style Guides.

A number of transgender Australians questioned the degree of emphasis placed on the woman's transgender status in the news articles and the relevance of her transgender status to the alleged crime. Some transgender Australians also questioned whether the individual's former name would have been given such prominent coverage if it had arisen from other circumstances, such as marriage. There seemed to exist little connection between the violent crime which made the individual newsworthy and the extreme emphasis placed on her transgender status in the articles. Some transgender Australians complained that the articles seemingly placed the individual "on trial for being transgender" rather than for the alleged violence.

A high volume of hateful and violent public comments were detected in social media in direct response to the publication of the articles. We noted that many of the comments incited violence based on the individual's gender identity rather than any alleged misconduct:

The comments were substantially more violent and aggressive than those we observed in six equivalent articles that were analysed covering similar crimes committed by cisgender Australians. Such violent comments were also not observed in response to news articles by other publishers that placed substantially less emphasis on the individual's transgender status.

Several transgender Australians filed complaints with the Australian Press Council however the Press Council concluded that the intimate details about the individual's transgender status were not gratuitous and the publishers took reasonable precautions to avoid materially contributing to the distress and prejudice experienced by transgender Australians.

In reaching this conclusion, the Press Council found that the individual's transgender status was relevant to the news story because the woman had requested access to hormonal medications in open court and there was a public interest in ensuring the provision of healthcare to detainees.

However, the Press Council did not comment on the relevance of information included about the woman's former name (including in the headlines), explicit details about her genitals and surgical history, or pre-transition photos. The Press Council did not explain why it considered that such information was newsworthy and necessary to discuss the administration of healthcare to detainees.

Significantly, the article did not discuss how the Court makes determinations about the provision of healthcare to detainees, which is particularly curious given the public interest justification cited by the publisher. The publisher did not verify whether the individual had received the requested healthcare.

The Press Council also referred to Ms Amati's request for healthcare using the term 'drugs' rather than 'medication'. Whilst there is an overlap in the meaning of the words, the term 'drugs' is commonly used by the Press Council to refer to illicit and narcotic substances⁶², whilst the term ‘medication’ appears to be ordinarily used in adjudications to refer to a prescribed substance used for therapeutic purposes.⁶³ The distinction is particularly important given that many ordinary Australians are not clear on whether gender dysphoria is a matter of medical pathology or mere personal ‘preference’.

The Press Council also concluded that “the Australian community is in the early stages of understanding the appropriate approach to respectfully and intelligently reporting on transgender issues.”⁶⁴ Despite this, transgender vilification provisions have been in force in State legislation for more than 22 years. GLAAD, the New York Times, and Reuters have had publicly available style guides to assist journalists to report accurately and responsibly on transgender issues for many years. The GLAAD media style guide, which is popular with many publishers and contains comprehensive information for journalists writing on LGBTI issues, was in its tenth edition when the Press Council made its statements about the press being in the “early stages of understanding”. Rainbow Rights Watch spoke with a number of transgender advocacy groups that have filed complaints over the period of many years with the Press Council concerning insensitive and inappropriate reporting.

The Press Council also accepted that it was reasonable for the Daily Telegraph article to “contrast the woman’s positive transition in 2012 with the crime for which she now stands accused.” This statement appears to be underpinned by a fundamental misunderstanding of what it means to be transgender, or why people transition. Nothing in the article established baseline data about the individual’s mental health and welfare before or after transition. Accordingly, nothing in the article established that the individual’s transition was in any way ‘positive’ or ‘negative’ or ‘successful’ or ‘unsuccessful’. Rainbow Rights Watch remains puzzled about how the Press Council has somehow arrived at the conclusion that it is possible to “contrast” a person’s gender or medical treatment to a crime.

At least one transgender Australian wrote to the Press Council in detail questioning the outcome of the adjudication and urging the Press Council to collaborate with transgender Australians to improve cultural competence in adjudicating transgender issues - particularly given that transgender Australians are not well represented in decisions made by the Press Council. No response was received.

6.5 Press Council Adjudication #1655

In 2016, a number of transgender Australians wrote to the Australian Press Council urging it to reconsider the outcome of Adjudication #1655 which concerned an article by the Gold Coast Bulletin about a transgender woman tasered by police during a violent arrest. The article included references to the woman’s transgender status “in the headline, the first paragraph and four other places in the article.”⁶⁵ The article also referred to the individual as “pre-surgery”, an unnecessary reference to her genitals and a problematic term that is discouraged in many journalistic style guides.

The police disclosure of private information about the woman’s transgender status and medical history to the press was ethically questionable, and upon request by Rainbow Rights Watch, the Queensland Police Ethical Standards Command Division initiated a six-month investigation into the matter.

Irrespective of how the information was obtained, a person’s sexual orientation, transgender status, or religion, is not of itself, newsworthy. Complainants questioned whether the inclusion of such information was gratuitous.

The Press Council concluded that the article did not breach its standards by repeatedly referencing the woman’s transgender status because her transgender status was “central to the police explanation of the reason for use of the taser.”⁶⁶ The Press Council failed to acknowledge, in accepting this claim, that it was necessarily also accepting by extension, that the publisher believed that Queensland Police were specifically targeting transgender people for the use of additional force beyond that used with the general public. Such a claim would result in an egregious violation of human rights in the form of State-sanctioned violence against transgender individuals. No such claim was made out in the article.

Transgender complainants argued that any ordinary reader or reasonable observer would have understood that the individual had been tasered by police because she could not be subdued using ordinary physical force, not because she was transgender per se.

The Press Council did not comment on why it considered that the publisher was justified in disclosing intimate details about the woman's medical history, her genital shape and surgical status, or how those details were central to the police decision to use a taser to subdue her.

The inability to distinguish between matters of physical strength and a person's transgender status point to a fundamental lack of cultural competence and awareness of what it means to be transgender within the Press Council.

At least one transgender Australian wrote to the Press Council in detail urging it to reconsider the outcomes of the adjudication and to collaborate with transgender individuals to improve cultural competence and awareness in the Press Council, particularly around how to better distinguish between gender stereotypes and gender identity. No response was received.

The prevailing view, apparently endorsed by the Press Council, appears to be that any public interest purpose, no matter how insignificant, justifies press coverage of any and all aspects of a person's transgender status, gender transition, medical history, former names, genital tissue, breast tissue, and surgical preferences. Neither publishers nor the Press Council appear capable (or willing) to distinguish between those aspects of a person's gender history, if any, that are relevant to the news story and those that are not.

6.6 Transgender Woman in Custody in UK

In November 2017, the Daily Mail published an article concerning a transgender woman who pleaded guilty to carrying out an unlawful act on a public railway. The article reported that the individual "... is one surgery away from fully transitioning to a woman", (whatever that may mean) and that she "...recently had breast implants and cosmetic surgery worth £10,000". The article also reported that the individual had been detained in gender segregated prison accommodation for men.

Although the information about the woman's transgender status and her gender transition were disclosed in open court and there is a public interest in reporting on decisions regarding where transgender prisoners should be housed, some transgender Australians questioned whether the amount of information disclosed in the article about the woman's transition was entirely relevant and proportional.

The article did not disclose whether or not the individual had sought transfer to a female prison or female accommodations. It did not disclose whether a Transgender Case Board had been convened to make a determination around housing for the individual, nor did it canvass the prison authority's 60-page process for the management of transgender individuals in custody. Neither sex reassignment surgery nor breast augmentation surgery are prerequisites for eligibility to transfer to female accommodations and the article did not appear to establish any relevance in these details. It was also unclear what the relevance was of the fees paid by the individual for surgery.

A number of transgender Australians complained to the Australian Press Council that the coverage of the woman's transition, in particular about her breast surgery and the fees paid for surgery, was gratuitous and intended to appeal to lurid curiosity around transgender bodies more than inform the public about the justice process. The Australian Press Council has yet to address the complaint.

6.7 Balance and Fairness

In addition to a strong negative overall sentiment of reporting in the industry as a whole, Rainbow Rights Watch also identified systemic issues of balance and fairness.

Rainbow Rights Watch believes the press should strive for balance in the sense of following the weight of credible evidence and attempting to present all sides of a story. According to the Australian Press Council, "fairness means that a journalist should strive for accuracy and truth in reporting, and not slant a story so a reader draws the reporter's desired conclusion."⁶⁷

6.7.1 Opinions of Medical Experts

We identified and analysed a large number of opinion articles discussing medical treatment for transgender Australians. Across all articles during the two year period of analysis, the most frequently cited expert in gender dysphoria was Dr John Whitehall, who was cited nearly three times more frequently than any other medical professional in opinion pieces.

Dr Whitehall holds himself out as an expert on approaches to treatment for gender dysphoric adolescents on the basis of his tenure in pediatric medicine. In 2017, Dr Whitehall denied the existence of gender dysphoria as a diagnosable illness despite the existence of clear diagnostic criteria articulated in the medical manuals of the World Health Organisation. He has appeared numerous times in religious forums hosted by the Australian Christian Lobby⁶⁸ as well as the New Zealand Family First Forum⁶⁹, where he has advocated for depriving Australian adolescents of medical treatment for gender dysphoria. In a seminar delivered to a religious audience in 2017, Dr Whitehall referred to gender dysphoric adolescents as a “doctrine of sin”, and to transgender individuals as a phenomenon to be “constrained and contained”, possibly caused as “a spin-off of pornography”. Dr Whitehall’s experience is as a pediatric neonatologist and pediatric generalist. He has never specialised in pediatric psychiatry and has never treated a single case of gender dysphoria. He has performed no original research into gender dysphoria. Dr Whitehall proposes no alternative approach to medical treatment for adolescents suffering from gender dysphoria. His experience in the specialty field of gender dysphoria appears to be exclusively limited to lobbying to deprive transgender adolescents of access to medical care. His views appear to be at odds with the world’s largest medical associations.

Whilst Dr Whitehall is free to hold the views he does, and Australians are entitled to be exposed to a range of views on such issues, it is concerning to see Dr Whitehall’s views given such dominant coverage to the exclusion of those Australian medical experts who actually specialise in this field and consequently have firsthand experience as well as a deeper awareness of the state of research into gender dysphoria. For example, Professor Sam Winter has extensively researched gender dysphoria and gender diversity for more than 17 years. He was a member of the World Health Organization’s Working Group on “Sexual Disorders and Sexual Health” which revised the WHO’s diagnostic criteria for gender dysphoria. Professor Winter is also a board member of the World Professional Association for Transgender Health, and has extensive experience in diagnosing and treating gender dysphoria. He co-authored the current Standards of Care. We observed that Professor Winter’s views were given virtually no coverage in the press during 2016 or 2017.

Whilst journalistic balance and fairness is never something that can be fully measured by column inches or number of articles, our semantic analysis suggests there exists a serious issue of balance and fairness in the Australian media’s coverage of medical opinion regarding treatment protocols for gender dysphoria. Australians are not being exposed to a range of views, and transgender individuals and the medical experts who actually care for them are systematically denied an opportunity to correct the record or provide a balancing view.

6.7.2 Opinions of Medical Associations

In addition to analysing how individual medical opinions were covered in the media, we also examined how the statements of medical associations were treated in the press.

We identified and analysed numerous opinion articles containing statements from medical associations about gender dysphoria. Across all articles during the two year period of analysis, the most frequently cited medical association was the American College of Pediatricians.

According to its founder, the American College of Pediatricians is a “Judeo-Christian” organisation open to both pediatricians and non-pediatricians provided they “hold true to the group’s core beliefs: that life begins at conception; and that the traditional family unit, headed by an opposite-sex couple, poses far fewer risk factors in the adoption and raising of children.”⁷⁰

The American College of Pediatricians periodically publishes position statements on its website. It has previously expressed positions opposing mandatory vaccination, supporting corporal punishment, opposing abortion and euthanasia, opposing legislation permitting child adoption by gay couples, and promoting abstinence-only sex education.

As at 2016, The American College of Pediatricians had less than 200 members. It was listed by the Southern Poverty Law Centre and the American Civil Liberties Union as an LGBTI hate group following statements it made that homosexuality and transsexuality were illnesses to be prevented. A number of commentators have criticised the organisation for (a) misrepresenting itself as a medical association when it was more properly characterised as a political and religious lobby group, and (b) putting its religious views ahead of evidence-based healthcare.

We observed the American College of Pediatricians cited in the Herald Sun, the Daily Telegraph, The Mercury, The Australian and the Courier Mail for its views on transgender healthcare. In each of the opinion articles we identified that cited the position of the American College of Pediatricians, background information about the religious and political nature of the organisation was omitted. The American College of Pediatricians was given greatest coverage by national opinion writers Andrew Bolt, Miranda Devine, and Kevin Donnelly.

Whilst the American College of Pediatricians is free to publish policy positions on issues relating to gender dysphoria, and Australians are entitled to be exposed to a range of views on such issues, it is concerning to see the American College of Pediatricians given such dominant coverage to the exclusion of other, much more eminent organisations.

For example, the American Academy of Pediatrics, the peak pediatrics body in the USA, has published several articles confirming the importance of gender-affirming healthcare for transgender adolescents. At last count, the American Academy of Pediatrics had more than 66,000 members working in primary care and subspecialties.⁷¹ Its mission statement is connected with the “optimal physical, mental, and social health and well-being for all infants, children, adolescents, and young adults.”⁷² The American Academy of Pediatrics has no religious or ideological alignment, and its sole concern is the health and wellbeing of children. Our analysis did not identify any articles during the period of analysis that cited the position of the American Academy of Pediatrics on the treatment of gender dysphoria.

Similarly, the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners, an eminent medical association of Australia whose position has yet to be cited in the press, has stated that “hormone therapy has been demonstrated to reduce distress without significant adverse psychological or physical effects.”⁷³ Other peak medical bodies that expressly support affirming healthcare treatments for gender dysphoria which were not given any coverage in the press in 2016 or 2017 include the American Medical Association, the American Psychiatric Association, the American Psychological Association, the International Endocrine Society, the World Professional Association for Transgender Health, the Royal Australia and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists, the Australian Psychological Association and the Australian Endocrine Society.

Whilst healthy and productive debate necessitates that the public be exposed to a range of views, it is concerning to see the views of the American College of Pediatricians given such dominant coverage to the exclusion of more mainstream, eminent medical bodies. Rainbow Rights Watch believes that journalistic balance should follow the weight of the evidence, rather than the religious, political or ideological agenda of the journalist or publisher. Overwhelming evidence should not be overlooked to drive a publisher’s agenda.

6.8 Misinformation and Misrepresentation

Our analysis identified numerous examples of misinformation, inaccuracies and omissions of key fact in articles which directly impact on the public perception of transgender people. We believe that the proliferation of social media facilitates the rapid spread of misinformation between readers and the public without any opportunity to verify facts. Given that public awareness of transgender issues is poor, and consequently the risk for harm is high, Rainbow Rights Watch believes publishers need to be careful to verify facts, fairly present data and use accurate language. Errors, omissions or inaccuracies should be promptly and clearly corrected. Where it has taken an extended period of time to correct the misinformation or inaccuracy, and resulting harm has occurred to the transgender community, publishers should publish a prompt and prominent apology.

6.8.1 Coverage of Proposed Reforms to Human Rights Treaty

In October 2017, nine.com.au published a news article covering recommended reforms to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (“ICCPR”), a UN treaty that has been ratified by Australia. Certain Articles in the treaty convey specific human rights protections for pregnant women, including protection from the death penalty. Because the scope of treaty’s provisions only confers protections to females, legal analysts have advised that transgender and intersex people are not protected in pregnancy if they are legally recognised as “male” or “indeterminate” sex.

Transgender men can, and frequently do, obtain legal recognition of their sex in Australia, the USA, the UK, and other sovereign states. Transgender Australians have been able to obtain legal recognition of their sex since 1995 in NSW, and since 2004 in Victoria. Under the current regime, pregnant men and other gender diverse Australians are not protected from State-sanctioned violence under the ICCPR in the same way that pregnant women are.

In 2017, the ICCPR fell due for review. In October, the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office made several recommendations for amendments. Among them was the recommendation that the treaty's articles conveying protections for pregnant women be expanded to provide equal protections to ALL pregnant people, irrespective of their legal sex. Their recommended solution involved replacing the term "pregnant women" with "pregnant people".

The issue was one of expanding the existing franchise of human rights to ensure equality under the law for all pregnant citizens, irrespective of whether their birth certificate states 'male', 'female' or otherwise. However, the issue was dramatically mischaracterised in nine.com.au's article as an attempt to "ban the phrase 'pregnant women'..."

The word "ban" implies a form of censorship. The Oxford Dictionary states that the word "ban" means to "forbid" or "prohibit".⁷⁴ Nothing in the submission of the Foreign Office sought to prohibit or forbid the phrase 'pregnant woman' in medicine, in society, or by individuals. The resulting misapprehension sparked significant outrage amongst the general public with repeated attacks on transgender people for purportedly attempting to prevent women from calling themselves women (even though the reform sought to do no such thing).

In addition to the improper characterisation, some transgender Australians were concerned about questions of balance. The article contained views from a prominent feminist opposing the extension of the ICCPR's human rights to transgender individuals. No balancing view was offered to audiences and no voice was given to transgender feminists about (a) the importance of transgender people being treated equally under the law, and (b) how the reform did not adversely impact on cisgender women as human rights are not a zero sum equation.

At least one transgender Australian complained directly to the publisher that the article was misleading. No response was received. No correction or apology was issued.

At least one transgender Australian filed a complaint of factual inaccuracy with the Australian Press Council, which is promoted as a prompt "alternative to litigation". As at the time of writing, more than three months had elapsed and the Press Council had not acted on any complaint.

The Australian also covered the story in a news piece, choosing the headline "Uprow as women are written out of the right to be pregnant". It remains unclear how the publisher concluded that expanding the existing franchise of human rights protections to all citizens could result in women losing the "right" to fall pregnant. Women would have remained able to fall pregnant (at least, to the same extent as beforehand), and would remain protected in pregnancy by the ICCPR's provisions, irrespective of whether or not the proposed amendments passed. The term 'pregnant people' is expansive and inclusive of people of all genders, including women. Some transgender Australians felt that the article's headline was deliberately misleading and was calculated to arouse unnecessary public outcry.

At least one transgender Australian complained in writing to The Australian that the headline was misleading. No response was received.

6.8.2 Claims that Hormone Therapy Causes Cancer

Throughout the period of analysis, a number of uncritical and unchallenged claims were published in the media alleging that hormone therapy that is used in the management of gender dysphoria is carcinogenic. The NT News and the Daily Telegraph both published an opinion piece in April 2017 claiming that cross-sex hormone therapy has "risks ranging from sterility to cancer." Another article, published in the Daily Telegraph in April 2016 claimed that the current treatment protocols for gender dysphoria commit the patient to "a lifetime of carcinogenic and otherwise toxic cross-sex hormones." The Daily Telegraph also elevated public concerns again in April 2017 about administering hormonal treatment to adolescents "which will stunt their growth and can cause cancer".

Another dubious statement, made by an individual whose only medical qualifications are in the fields of psychotherapy and hypnosis, was repeated by the Daily Mail Australia in October 2017 claiming that "the hormone testosterone can increase red blood cells so there's a higher risk of heart attack and strokes." The article omitted the important detail that all males generally have higher red blood cell counts than females; and a correspondingly higher risk.

A number of transgender Australians conveyed their frustration that the above claims had the effect, if not the intent, of exciting irrational fear in readers about potentially harmful effects of the current treatment protocols. The claims connecting bioidentical cross-sex hormones with cancer, heart attack and stroke are highly questionable, if not specious. They are not borne out by credible medical evidence.

All of the hormonal medications prescribed for the management of gender dysphoria in Australia are approved by the Therapeutic Goods Association.

On the question of safety, the Pediatric Endocrine Society stated in its 2016 position statement that:

*"Long-term data from transgender patients treated as adults show that this therapy is overall safe and there are no data to suggest that use of estrogen or testosterone, when used at physiologic doses, leads to a cancer risk higher than expected for the average adult male, in the case of transmales, or the adult female, in the case of transfemales."*⁷⁵

The 18,000 member International Endocrine Society states that hormonal interventions are:

*"...relatively safe (when appropriately monitored...)"*⁷⁶

The Royal Australian College of General Practitioners has stated that

*"hormone therapy has been demonstrated to reduce distress without significant adverse psychological or physical effects."*⁷⁷

The articles did not provide any credible medical evidence to support these claims of carcinogenicity. The journalists did not offer any alternative viewpoint, and the publisher did not publish any material in a similar online location, providing detailed medical evidence that could have refuted such a serious claim.

Given the risk of unnecessarily exciting a public health scare, at least one transgender Australian complained in writing to the Australian Press Council. The Press Council provides advisory guidelines for journalists to reduce the risk of public panic caused by "inadequately researched reports on health and medical matters appearing in the press and in the media as whole." According to the Press Council, the "dangers of exciting unreasonable fears or hopes are far too great for anything but the most careful treatment" by the press.

The Press Council declined to investigate one complaint on the grounds that the complaint was lodged outside of the 30 day window. A second complaint has yet to be acted on by the Press Council. More than three months have elapsed since the complaint was lodged and the Press Council does not have any public performance targets for timely response to complaints.

6.8.3 Coverage of Sexual Assault by Transgender Woman

In October 2017, the Daily Mail Australia published a news article titled "Transgender Woman is Convicted of Sexually Assaulting a 10-year old in a Women's Bathroom". The claim that the assault took place in a women's bathroom was repeated throughout the article.

The piece was significant given the public controversy around policies allowing transgender Australians to access toilets and public accommodations congruent with their gender identity. Despite empirical evidence to the contrary, anti-LGBTI groups continue to advance the view that such policies undermine the safety of women and children.

Within 48 hours of publication, tens of thousands of public comments were observed, particularly on social media, demanding that such policies be reversed and transgender people be denied access to public accommodations matching their gender identity on the basis that the incident was evidence that the existence of transgender individuals, especially transgender women, in public accommodations was a threat to the safety of cisgender (non-transgender) women and children.

Subsequent investigation revealed the assault had, in fact, occurred in a privately-owned residential home, in an ordinary bathroom that was not reserved for people of any particular gender. Accordingly, public policies depriving transgender people of access to public accommodations matching their gender identity would not have prevented the incident.

Numerous transgender individuals complained to the publisher about the factual error and its effect on the debate. The publisher did not issue a retraction or apology. When the article was finally updated more than 70 hours later to reflect the facts, the moral panic had well and truly spread and some transgender Australians may have experienced abuse or assault in bathrooms. A number of transgender Australians felt that an apology was warranted, given the harmful consequences of the inaccuracy and the delay in correcting the error. None was forthcoming.

The image shows a screenshot of a Daily Mail article from September 21st, 2017. The headline reads: "Transgender woman is convicted of sexually assaulting a 10-year-old girl in women's bathroom". The article text includes bullet points: "Michelle Martinez - known as Miguel before identifying as a female - found guilty", "She took a girl, 10, to a bathroom where she touched her breasts and genitalia", "Nurses then found evidence of the shocking abuse, which included penetration", and "Martinez faces 70 years in jail for first and second degree sexual abuse of minor". To the right of the article is a comment section with several user comments and replies. The comments are: "This is exactly what people were concerned about and how it's happened.", "What better way for a sexual predator to pretend to be a transgender to get at little girls. It's going to keep happening unfortunately.", "Why would you let your child anywhere near that thing? The parents are to blame for their lack of care. And stop calling it a 'gender'. That is a man dressed as a woman.", and "This is not a transgender. This is a predator pretending to be a transgender in order to prey on victims. He (and it is a he, make no mistake) will find his justice inside." The comment section shows various user avatars, names, and interaction icons like 'Like' and 'Reply'.

6.8.4 Claims Denying Pervasiveness of Discrimination against Transgender Australians

Another opinion piece published by the Daily Telegraph, the Townsville Bulletin and the Herald Sun in August 2017 claimed that Australia is similar the USA in that, "transgendered [sic] people are a favoured political class. Far from being discriminated against or disfavoured in society, if you are gay or transgendered [sic], you get bonus points. You are applauded, celebrated, encouraged."

The claim that transgender Australians are far from discriminated against or disfavoured is open to objective rebuttal and may have been both dishonest and inflammatory. According to the Trans Pathways Survey⁷⁸, Australia's largest study of the welfare of 859 transgender youth, 78.9% of transgender youth have experienced issues with school, university or TAFE. 22% have experienced homelessness or accommodation crises. 89% have experienced abuse, assault or bullying. 69% have experienced discrimination in education or the provision of goods and services, and 48% have attempted suicide.

In the United States, a transgender individual is 4 to 5 times more likely to be living below the poverty line than the general population.⁷⁹ A 2009 meta-study also examined the frequency of transphobic violence in police reports, social service records, and needs assessments. It found:

"All three sources indicate[d] that violence against transgender people starts early in life, that transgender people are at risk for multiple types and incidences of violence, and that this threat lasts throughout their lives. In addition, transgender people seem to have particularly high risk for sexual violence."⁸⁰

The overwhelming balance of evidence contradicts the claim that transgender individuals are a "favoured class" of people in either the USA or Australia. Unfortunately, no balancing article or rebuttal was published in the same section of the newspaper presenting evidence of the unconscionably high rates of abuse, social rejection, discrimination, homelessness, unemployment and violence experienced by transgender Australians. At least one transgender Australian wrote to the publisher but was not given an opportunity of reply. The article was an example of extreme press partisanship supported by distortion and dishonesty.

Rainbow Rights Watch believes that opinion pieces published in the media should not be based on wildly inaccurate factual material, distortions of truth, or the omission of key facts. The blanket denial and dismissal of severe forms of discrimination that are manifestly and empirically evident serves only to obstruct meaningful social change. It also undermines the credibility of the journalism profession as a whole.

At least one transgender Australian complained to the Australian Press Council about 'fairness' in the article. The Press Council declined to investigate the complaint as it fell outside the 30-day lodgment window. The article remains online and continues to influence public perceptions of transgender Australians.

6.8.5 Articles Conflating Gender Dysphoria with Gender Expression

A number of articles were identified which conflated matters of gender dysphoria with gender non-conforming behaviours.

For example, an article published by The Australian in November 2017 claimed that "there is much confusion between gender identity and gender roles. There have always been children who don't fit gender roles and who don't want to conform to them," going on to imply such individuals were at risk of being incorrectly diagnosed as gender dysphoric. An article published in the Daily Telegraph in April 2017 stated that "until very recently, society serenely accepted that some girls were tomboys who liked to climb trees and some boys were dreamy souls who liked dressing up. It didn't mean they needed puberty blockers or cross-sex hormone therapy, or to have their genitals -'reassigned'. But these days, tomboys... might be -diagnosed as suffering from "gender dysphoria", and encouraged to "transition" to the opposite sex."

The above allegation, which was likely to have the effect, if not the intent, of exciting an irrational public fear of adolescents being misdiagnosed as transgender, flagrantly misrepresents the diagnostic procedures and criteria for gender dysphoria. The medical profession clearly distinguishes between behaviour that does not conform to gender stereotypes and the real and persistent distress that a gender dysphoric person feels about their own body. Childhood behaviour that does not comply with gender stereotypes would not, of itself, lead to a diagnosis of gender dysphoria.

On this issue, the American Psychiatric Association states:

"Gender dysphoria is not the same as gender nonconformity, which refers to behaviors not matching the gender norms or stereotypes of the gender assigned at birth. Examples of gender nonconformity (also referred to as gender expansiveness or gender creativity) include girls behaving and dressing in ways more socially expected of boys or occasional cross-dressing in adult men. Gender nonconformity is not a mental disorder."⁸¹

Similarly, the WPATH Standards of Care state:

*"Gender Nonconformity is not the same as Gender Dysphoria. Gender nonconformity refers to the extent to which a person's gender identity, role, or expression differs from the cultural norms prescribed for people of a particular sex (Institute of Medicine, 2011). Gender dysphoria refers to discomfort or distress that is caused by a discrepancy between a person's gender identity and that person's sex assigned at birth (and the associated gender role and/or primary and secondary sex characteristics) (Fisk, 1974; Knudson, De Cuypere, & Bockting, 2010b). Only some gender nonconforming people experience gender dysphoria at some point in their lives."*⁸²

Nothing in the WPATH Standards of Care "encourage" medical transition and the use of such language has the potential to unnecessarily excite an unreasonable fear of misdiagnosis in the general public. Rather, the gender affirmative model "supports identity exploration and development without an a priori goal of any particular gender identity or expression." The appropriate course of treatment is largely guided by the patient's expressed symptoms and experiences, with no person receiving irreversible forms of treatment unless they have attained Gillick competency.

The use of scare quotes around the terms "transition" and "gender dysphoria" to convey the author's subjective skepticism or contempt for the diagnosis and treatment process was also noted. In their ordinary usage, quotation marks are indicators of a faithful reproduction of the exact words of another person. They give the reader a degree of confidence in the accuracy of the attributed statements. However, quotation marks often imply, particularly when placed around single words or very short phrases not attributable to anyone, that a word or phrase "should not be taken at face value."⁸³ Scare quotes can suggest "disbelief or actual disagreement" with the word used.⁸⁴

Some transgender Australians believed that the article had, in all likelihood, been calculated to incite public outcry about a perceived risk of adolescents being incorrectly diagnosed as gender dysphoric. The article seemed contrary to the advice of the Australian Press Council that "the dangers of exciting unreasonable fears... are far too great for anything but the most careful treatment" when discussing risks and efficacy of medical treatment.⁸⁵

Subsequently, one or more transgender individuals filed a complaint with the Australian Press Council about the second article. However, the Press Council declined to investigate the issue as lodgment of the complaint fell outside the 30-day limitation period. The article remains online and continues to influence the public perception of transgender Australians.

6.8.5 Allegations that Doctors or Educators are Promoting "Transgender Lifestyles"

Another common pattern we observed was frequent claims made by opinion writers that gender transition is being promoted to adolescents by educators and the medical profession.

The claim that the medical profession "encourages" gender transition was repeated so frequently in 2016 and 2017 that many transgender individuals became desensitised to it. According to the Oxford Dictionary, the word "encourage", when used with an infinitive and an object (as it was in most articles) means to "persuade (someone) to do or continue to do something by giving support and advice."⁸⁶ The element of "persuasion" is entirely lacking from the Standards of Care.

For example, an article published by The Australian in November 2017 sensationally argued that "the most innocent victims include children who are encouraged to go down a path of gender reassignment with puberty blockers, chemicals and, when they are older, gender--reassignment surgery." A Daily Mail Australia article published in October 2017 sensationally claimed "the most innocent victims include children who are encouraged to go down a path of gender reassignment with puberty blockers, chemicals and, when they are older, gender--reassignment surgery." A Daily Telegraph editorial, published in September 2016 speculated that would be "repeating one of history's great mistakes if any children were being unnecessarily encouraged or coerced into transition" Another sensationalist claim, made by the Daily Mail Australia in November 2017 alleged that "perhaps most grievous of all, teenagers are placed on a medical conveyor belt which leads to powerful body-changing drugs and possibly to surgical alteration." Another Daily Telegraph article published in April 2017 alleged that "tomboys... might be -diagnosed as suffering from "gender dysphoria", and encouraged to "transition"

These claims set the groundwork for further dubious assertions that society was interfering with the autonomy of transgender youth, rather than allowing them freedom to express themselves. For example, the Daily Telegraph called for change in September 2016, saying "Generally speaking, surely the best rule of thumb is to just let kids be kids." The same claim was codified into the headline of another Daily Telegraph article in November 2016 which demanded that "Let Kids be Kids: Stop Playing God with Young Lives".

Each of the above politically confected claims can only be premised on a fundamental misunderstanding of the treatment protocols for gender dysphoria coupled with a basic distrust in the medical diagnosis itself. The statements mischaracterise the Standards of Care in a way that is likely to incite irrational public fear and distress about children being coerced or steered into needless and potentially harmful medical treatments.

The medical Standards of Care do not, and have never, encouraged, promoted, or steered patients towards any particular gender identity. The element of "persuasion" cannot be found anywhere in the medical process. The medical Standards view all gender identities as equally legitimate and natural, with none more favourable or preferable than any other. The standards of care "support identity exploration and development without an a priori goal of any particular gender identity or expression." Rather than persuading the patient about their identity, the standards of care accept and affirm the identity expressed by the individual without judgement or criticism, even if that identity changes over time.

The gender-affirming approach, which does not seek to influence an individual's identity in any way, is based on the guidelines of the Australian Psychological Association:

Given that there is no empirical evidence to support therapeutic approaches that direct transgender people to live as the gender normatively expected of the sex they were assigned at birth, attempting to do so would be counter to the guidelines outlined above. Specifically, it would not demonstrate respect for the person, and as such would likely be experienced as coercive. The available evidence supports the APS recommendation that psychologists utilise mental health practices that affirm transgender people's experiences."³⁷

Dr Keo-Meier, the lead author of the American Psychological Association's guidance document for treatment of gender dysphoria has stated:

"Practitioners of the gender affirmative model do not push children in any direction, rather, they listen to children and, with the help of parents, translate what the child is communicating about their gender identity and expression. They work toward improving gender health, where a child is able to live in the gender that feels most authentic to the child and can express gender without fear of rejection."³⁸

Continued claims that the medical profession "encourages" or "promotes" transgender lifestyles are demonstrably wrong. The medical standards of care are transparently neutral. By continuously mischaracterising the Standards of Care, the Australian press needlessly incites irrational public fears about children being coerced into an identity that is not appropriate of them. Such mischaracterisations undermine public confidence in the medical profession, sustain prejudice against transgender people, and discredit the integrity of the press.

6.8.6 Claims that Transgender Australians are a Mere "Fad"

Other articles sought to invalidate or trivialise the serious nature of gender dysphoria by implying that transgender identities are a mere fashionable lifestyle choice. For example, one article published in the Daily Telegraph in September 2017 referred to transgender Australians as a "social fad". Another article, published by the Daily Telegraph in November 2016 referred to "a trend in which parents are procuring questionable hormone therapy..." Another Daily Telegraph article, published in July 2017 repeated the description of gender dysphoria as a "dangerous behavioural fashion trend" as well as a "dangerous fad." A claim made by one individual that the current medical treatment protocols amount to a "fashion in child surgical abuse" was repeated in the Daily Telegraph in November 2016, April 2017, and again in September 2017. An article published by the Herald Sun in March 2017 employed the headline "Pushing the Transgender Fashion". A Daily Mail article published in November 2017 claims: "Most of these politically correct fads are just designed to wind us up and provoke us".

Some transgender Australians took offence to the claim that transgender identities were a matter of "fashion", particularly given the social rejection, isolation, discrimination, abuse and violence experienced by transgender individuals. The term "fad" or "fashion" tends to imply some sort of popularity, endorsement, public favour or public embrace. By contrast, Australia's largest study of transgender youth found that 89% had experienced peer rejection and social isolation, 69% had experienced discrimination, 66% had a lack of family support, and 22% had experienced homelessness. These statistics do not support the claim that being transgender is fashionable in any way.

Rainbow Rights Watch believes that journalists and publishers must hold themselves accountable for the language used and not make wildly inaccurate statements that are not supported by credible evidence.

6.8.7 News Stories Covering De-Transition

In September 2017, Nine Network Australia published on its website the story of an Australian adolescent who de-transitioned after undergoing semi-irreversible pubertal gender transition. Whilst aspects of the individual's detransition were covered sensitively, many transgender individuals were concerned about misrepresentation and the omission of material facts in the coverage.

The video segment was aggressively promoted as a breaking scandal about "how experts can get it wrong" and instantiate forms of "self-discovery marred by misdiagnosis" in youth experiencing gender dysphoria. The video also portrayed diagnosticians as potentially negligent or reckless, claiming they made "fast judgments" and failed to allow transgender adolescents the "time to figure it out."

A full screen headline in the video made the claim that medical professionals had caused physical, semi-irreversible harm to the individual, sensationally asserting that "THEY CHANGED HIS BODY". The all capitals graphic was accompanied by dramatic music.

The piece appeared to place the burden of responsibility for the individual's circumstance at the feet of the medical profession, when in fact the individual had never been prescribed any irreversible forms of treatment. The individual's mother had been administering hormones to the individual contrary to medical advice. The publisher played down the fact that medical Standards of Care were not followed by the parents. The piece did not clearly acknowledge that the Standards of Care, if properly followed, would have in fact prevented the outcome. Moreover, the Standards of Care, if properly followed by the parents, would have allowed the "time needed to figure it out" which was precisely the criticism levelled against the medical profession.

The piece gave substantial coverage to the views of Dr John Whitehall, who holds himself out as an expert on gender dysphoria. Referring to the current medical protocols, Dr Whitehall claimed that "there is no proof that this is going to work. You think their emotional problems are going to get better by giving them oestrogen. Fine. That's called optimism. It's not called scientific method."

Whilst Dr Whitehall is free to hold those views, they are clearly open to objective rebuttal. For example, data collected by Beyond Blue, Curtin University, and the Western Australia Centre for Health found significantly lower rates of depression and anxiety in transgender people who wanted and were provided transition-related healthcare, saying "this supports previous research that access to hormones and surgery improves quality of life."³⁹

Audiences were not offered a balancing view about the extensive medical research underpinning the existing treatment protocols. No evidence was advanced substantiating the efficacy and evidence-based nature of the treatment protocols. The views of no other medical professional were put to audiences of the video content. The only opposing view was published separately in a less prominent online location and was sourced from a psychologist rather than a physician specialist.

The news story also received widespread coverage in the Daily Mail Australia, news.com.au, msn.com and The Australian. Numerous articles and opinion pieces were published in the Daily Telegraph. Several of the articles attributed responsibility for the outcome to "the experts ... getting it wrong", rather than parents deviating from the evidence-based Standards of Care and administering hormones contrary to medical advice. One opinion piece claimed that "there is no medical evidence to justify the epidemic of transgender kids. No evidence that changing sex will reduce the incidence of self-harm or suicide." No alternative viewpoint was put to readers in the article or any other article published in a similar online location - despite the fact that the claim is clearly open to objective rebuttal. The Standards of Care contain no less than 370 references to academically robust, peer-reviewed medical studies substantiating the basis and the efficacy of the treatment protocols.

Rainbow Rights Watch observed tens of thousands of comments from the public, many of whom were outraged by what they perceived as reckless medical care. None of the articles we analysed ameliorated public fears by clearly stating that the existing Standards of Care, and medical advice, if properly followed by the individual's parents, would have prevented the outcome.

Some transgender Australians considered that the community response also provided strong evidence of the public bias against transgender individuals. The extraordinary public concern about, and compassion for, a cisgender (non-transgender) person whose physical embodiment was incongruent with their gender identity provides a stark contrast to the negative views and perception of a transgender person in the exact same situation.

A number of other de-transition stories were noted. News.com.au published an article in May 2017 which covered one individual's personal story of "transgender regret". An article published in The Guardian in February 2017 was titled "Experience: I regret transitioning". The Daily Mail Australia published an article in April 2017 dramatically titled "It was the worst decision I ever made...". Another Daily Mail Australia published an October 2017 article led with the headline "The rise of transgender reversals: Surgeon in sex-change hub of Serbia reports a surge in the rate of patients changing their mind" which discussed the "surge in patients wanting to reverse their transgender surgery".

Another article, published by the Australian in November 2017, had the effect, if not the intent, of inciting irrational public fear about Australians undergoing unnecessary surgeries they would go on to regret. The article claimed "these are high stakes for the most vulnerable people, especially those wrongly drawn into gender-reassignment surgery." The article pointed to the growing number of individuals seeking reversal as evidence of misdiagnosis and recklessness by the medical profession, claiming the "First cut is the deepest but reversal also traumatic for trans community" and expressing concern about "more and more people seeking surgery to reverse their gender-reassignment surgery."

A number of transgender Australians complained that the articles were exploiting transgender Australians and the poor rates of public understanding to incite unjustified fears amongst readers of false positive diagnoses, contrary to the advice provided in the Press Council guidelines on medical statements.

Most of the articles omitted the significant fact that the rate of "reversal" surgeries is declining in proportion to the overall number of gender confirmation surgeries being performed. Similarly, it did not make clear that the 14 "reversal" surgeries being performed each year were statistically insignificant in the context of the 25,000 gender reassignment surgeries estimated to be performed each year around the globe. According to the World Professional Association for Transgender Health, numerous medical follow-up studies have shown an "undeniable beneficial effect of sex reassignment surgery on postoperative outcomes such as subjective wellbeing, cosmesis, and sexual function". The medical association also concluded that regret rates were extraordinarily low and "even patients who develop severe surgical complications seldom regret having undergone surgery."

The degree of coverage given to de-transition or desistance stories appears to be out grossly disproportionate to the actual frequency of detransition and regret in society. Statistics from the Royal Children's Hospital show that less than 4% of transgender Australians desist, but a very high proportion of opinion articles made reference to transgender "desistence" or "regret". Accordingly, Rainbow Rights Watch is concerned that such slanted coverage may have the effect of inciting unreasonable fear in the public that that the medical standards are doing more harm than good. Very few of the articles we analysed made clear that de-transition is very rare, that most transgender people who transition go on to lead happier, functional lives in their new gender role (subject to public tolerance), or the importance of allowing individuals to make their own properly informed choices about therapeutic medical treatments.

An editorial published by the Daily Telegraph in August 2016 also misrepresented the medical process and implicitly accused parents of gender non-conforming youth of pursuing ideological agendas by "vicariously" making irreversible decisions about their child's gender. The editorial sensationally claimed that "no child, let alone a four-year-old, is in a position to make potentially irreversible life-changing decisions, even vicariously via their parents or the state. And if it is not the child's decision but that of the parents and/or the state, then it is reasonable to ask to what extent are the values or ideologies of the adults involved being projected onto the child." The article wrongly implied that four year olds are receiving irreversible forms of treatment; this is not, and never has been, the case. No transgender individual in Australia has ever received any form of "irreversible" treatment until they have attained Gillick competency, usually around the age of 16. Under the Standards of Care, children aged four who are distressed about their gender are not offered any irreversible forms of treatment. Parents are recommended to give their child the freedom to explore their identity and to dress, express and define themselves in whatever way they are comfortable. Some children are also provided with psycho-counselling to help deal with the social stigma that may be directed at them if they do not conform to normatively expected gender stereotypes. Contrary to the article's claims, there are no irreversible life decisions made at the age of four.

The editorial misrepresented the medical care process and most likely had the effect of inciting irrational and avoidable public outcry about four year olds making "irreversible life-changing decisions."

6.8.8 Misrepresentation of Law

A number of articles were detected which misrepresented the state of the law on matters of transgender medicine.

In November 2016, an opinion writer at the Daily Telegraph sensationally claimed that "Now laws are changing to discourage doctors from offering children any alternative to gender transition." The article capitalised on existing public fears, set up by other articles, that children might be 'steered' or 'corralled' into unnecessary gender transitions. Another article, published in the Australian in October 2017 repeated the claim that "You must not question it, and that's being written into law and policy. If you can't question this, if you can only -affirm, then you don't explore."

The new legislation to which the articles referred was the Health Complaints Act 2016 (Vic) which was enacted to ensure that Victorians receive safe and ethical care from medical providers. This legislation prohibits forms of treatment that are fraudulent and negligent insofar as they are not based on credible scientific evidence published in peer-reviewed medical literature generally recognized by the relevant medical bodies.

Conversion therapy (which attempts to "rid" a person of their homosexual and transsexual "tendencies") and other equivalent unethical forms of practice would likely already be in violation of relevant medical ethics standards, and may already be captured under tort law when practiced by a licensed physician. The new legislation was aimed at preventing unethical treatments performed by individuals who are not medical or psychological professionals. Conversion therapy is not medically ethical because it is shown by evidence to be ineffective and to exacerbate the distress and suicidality of the patient. According to WPATH:

*"Treatment aimed at trying to change a person's gender identity and expression to become more congruent with sex assigned at birth has been attempted in the past without success (Gelder & Marks, 1969; Greenson, 1964), particularly in the long term (Cohen-Kettenis & Kuiper, 1984; Pauly, 1965). Such treatment is no longer considered ethical."*⁹⁰

Importantly, the new legislation leaves open all current and future forms of medical treatment that are shown by credible evidence to be clinically effective. Current standards of care already provide for legitimate and safe forms of treatment that don't involve any medical transition, such as psychocounselling support or minor social changes. Treatment options are not, and have never been, limited to either full medical transition or complete denial of a child's gender identity.

Courts also appear to be concerned about the accuracy of reporting in the Australian press of medico-legal issues surrounding gender dysphoria. Speaking per curiam in Re:Kelvin, the Full Court of Appeal of the Family Court of Australia observed that "this case, and other earlier cases involving Gender Dysphoria, have attracted widespread media attention. Insofar as the reporting of the legal issues is concerned, at least some of the reports have, at best, been incomplete and, at worst, inaccurate."⁹¹

6.8.9 Misrepresentation of Medical Studies

In September 2016, The Age and the Sydney Morning Herald published a lengthy opinion piece expressing concern about a four year old who identified as transgender or gender non-conforming. Notwithstanding a wide consensus in the academic psychology field that gender formation is complete before the age of four, the author expressed concerns about a child so young deviating from the stereotypical behaviours and identities expected of their birth sex.

The article made many anecdotal claims about transgender “regret” and statistical claims that transgender youth are likely to “desist”. The article quoted two medical professionals from the American College of Pediatricians. Even though many of the claims made are not borne out by credible medical evidence, no alternative views were put to readers, either within the article, or in a separate article with equal prominence in a similar location of the publication.

Significantly, the article claimed that “In Sweden, which is renowned for its tolerance of diversity, suicide rates are up to 20 times higher among adults who have undergone hormone and sex [re]assignment surgery.”

Rainbow Rights Watch assumes the study referred to is that of Dr Cecilia Dhejne, who tracked the welfare of 324 sex-reassigned people in Sweden between 1973 and 2003.⁹² The study was cited in 2015 by the American College of Pediatricians, and echoed by an Australian Christian Lobby spokesperson on a national current affairs program as well as numerous online and print publications opposing social integration and medical care for transgender Australians.

Dr Dhejne has repeatedly refuted the conclusions drawn by the American College of Pediatricians, the Australian Christian Lobby and the article’s author, saying “People who misuse my study always omit the fact that the study clearly states that it is not an evaluation of gender dysphoria treatment. If we look at the literature, we find that several recent studies conclude that WPATH Standards of Care compliant treatment decrease gender dysphoria and improves mental health.” The study does not show that surgical reassignment results in increased risk of suicide or suicidal ideation because it uses the general population as a control group, rather than transgender individuals who did not undergo surgery. This distinction is especially significant because the study took place in a period of human history when transsexuality was extremely stigmatised. The study explicitly states that the data is not open to the conclusions implied by the article’s author about the efficacy of sex reassignment.

6.9 Derogatory Language

We observed repeated and sustained use of derogatory language directed at transgender Australians during the period of analysis. Derogatory language commonly takes the form of slurs or dehumanising language. A slur is a denigrating or insulting term intended to offend a particular class of people. Common slurs targeting transgender people are “tranny”, “shemale”, “ladyboy”, and “shim”, a contraction of the words “she” and “him”.

Dehumanising language is language that reduces a person by depriving them of human qualities. Dehumanising terms frequently used to refer to transgender people include “it” and “thing”. Such terms are usually reserved for inanimate objects rather than humans.

Many style guides recommend that slurs targeting transgender Australians should be treated by the media similarly to equivalent slurs directed towards people of minority sexual orientations or religions. Ethical journalistic practice is to avoid using derogatory language in publications unless it is essential to the story and only when used in a direct quotation intended to convey the bias of the speaker. Slurs such as ‘tranny’ are censored in the Style Guides of the Victorian Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Associated Press, Reuters, New York Times, GLAAD, and TGEU.

During the period of analysis, numerous examples of derogatory language targeted at transgender Australians were observed in the Australian press. Derogatory language was observed in the body of articles as well as in public comments. Derogatory language was observed in both news and opinion pieces.

For example, in January 2017, the Daily Telegraph published a commentary about an Australian transgender woman accused of a violent crime. The opening sentence of the article read “Having been chopped herself, Sydney tranny Evie Amati allegedly sought to share the experience.” The Chronicle published a Lifestyle story in November 2017 with the headline “A Night at a Ladyboy Bar in Manila.” In August 2017, the Newcastle Herald published a “Local News” piece by a sports commentator at the 2016 Olympics which contained the phrase “Luckily for us, we didn’t run into the same group of trannies that accosted the Channel Nine News crew last week.”

Both the Daily Telegraph and The Australian also repeatedly published transphobic slurs in the public comments section of various articles:

"Too little tolerance becomes oppression. Too much tolerance becomes permissiveness, which destroys social norms and values and even the accepted meaning of words themselves."

And so goes the rest of the article, as confused as a tranny before she realises what she's all about and comes out. But in conservative world, definitely not to your schoolmates, especially not at Kings! Never mind some of the teachers who have taught there, if you're not a real man in that institution the rest of them will turn on you and show you social isolation and bruises. That'll teach these poofs to be sensitive and not learn how to go off to war and die a hero.

Journalists who use multiple identities should, at least, have a LBTNFSPSAW byline.

...As long as tranny children are "safe". It's OK. She can be a bully and commit acts of assault anywhere she likes. She is morally superior.

I would really REALLY love to see someone respond to her unprovoked violence by slapping her so hard her feet leave the ground, but that's just me. Self-defence issues. Bad me. Clearly a misogynist, racist, capitalist, deplorable. Not awesome and beyond reproach like her/ze/it/whatever.

At this point I am actually SO over all this nasty fascist totalitarian behaviour of SJWs I would actually rather spend time with a real racist or sexist than an SJW. At least they do not have a god complex.

Get me a bucket.

Unfortunately, computerised quantitative analysis was not effective in identifying examples of dehumanising language in the bodies of articles. The natural language search algorithms could not distinguish between instances of terms like ‘it’ and “thing” being used in their ordinary sense, as compared to when they were being used as a pejorative epithet. A number of attempts were made to configure the language analysis software to distinguish between different usages based on word proximity heuristics, however these proved ultimately unsuccessful. Rainbow Rights watch is examining more advanced computational methods of analysis for future reports.

About

About the Authors

Andrea Waling (PhD): Dr Andrea Waling is a Research Fellow at Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health & Society (ARCSHS), La Trobe University. She specialises in qualitative research methods, LGBTI+ issues, men and masculinity studies, bodies, raunch culture and sexualisation, and studies in gender and sexuality, and has a keen interest in research that supports marginalised communities. She has worked across or lead a number LGBTI+-focused research projects addressing issues of lateral violence, and health and well-being in LGBTI+ communities.

Gene Lim (BA Hons): Gene is a Research Assistant at ARCSHS, La Trobe University and a PhD candidate at Monash University. Their PhD research project looks at the intersectionality of ethnicity, sexuality and a range of social outcomes, including HIV risk. Their other research projects have qualitatively examined how Bisexual People of Colour navigate communities of belonging. Their research interests include supporting Queer, Transgender and Intersex People of Colour, and in the psychosocial well-being of these groups.

Sheila Dhalla (MIT): Sheila Dhalla is a Research and Projects Officer at the Lifeline Research Foundation. Her interests lie in engaging, enabling and translating research activities to support unmet crisis support needs in marginalised communities such as LGBTQ individuals, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, and People of Colour communities.

Anthony Lyons (PhD): A/Prof Anthony Lyons is a Principal Research Fellow and Acting Director at ARCSHS, La Trobe University. He has done a wealth of work with marginalised and stigmatised communities such as LGBTQ individuals, and persons living with HIV. His work is multidisciplinary, bringing together public health, social psychology, health psychology, and positive psychology, with specialisation in a range of methods, including experimental designs and large national and multinational surveys.

Adam Bourne (PhD): A/Prof Adam Bourne is a Principal Research Fellow at ARCSHS, La Trobe University, and leads LGBTI health and well-being related research at the centre. His work centres on sexual health, health promotion and health inequalities. He is also an accomplished researcher in the fields of illicit substance use among Gay and Bisexual Men, and in HIV/STI research, and has published widely on the subject matter.

About the Reference Group

QLife (1800 184 527) is Australia's first nationally-oriented counselling and referral service for people who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, and/or intersex (LGBTI+). QLife provides nation-wide, early intervention, peer supported telephone and web based services to people of all ages across the full breadth of people's bodies, genders, relationships, sexualities, and lived experiences. For more information, visit [www.qlife.org.au](http://www qlife.org.au).

ACON is a New South Wales based health promotion organisation specialising in HIV prevention, HIV support and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI+) health. Established in 1985, it aims to end HIV transmission among gay and homosexually active men, and promote the lifelong health of LGBTI+ people and people with HIV. For more information, visit www.acon.org.au.

About Lifeline Australia

Lifeline (13 11 14) is a national charity and leading provider of services for suicide prevention in Australia, providing all Australians experiencing a personal crisis with access to 24 hour crisis support and suicide prevention services. This service answers around 2500 calls each day. Lifeline's services are now made possible through the efforts of around 1,000 staff and 11,000 volunteers, operating from over 38 sites nationwide. In 2018 82% of the 893,128 total calls were answered from people struggling to cope with issues including suicide, loneliness, mental health, relationship difficulties, and financial stress. For more information, visit www.lifeline.org.au.

About ARCSHS

The Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society (ARCSHS) located at La Trobe University in Melbourne, Australia, is a centre for social research into sexuality, health and the social dimensions of human relationships. It works collaboratively and in partnership with communities, community-based organisations, government and professionals in relevant fields to produce research that advances knowledge and promotes positive change in policy, practice and people's lives. For more information, visit www.latrobe.edu.au/ARCSHS.

About the Terms We Use

This report uses a number of terms that may not be familiar to some readers. Glossary of LGBTI+ Terms and Glossary of Crisis Service Support Terms has been provided at the end of this report. The Glossary of LGBTI+ Terms has been developed and approved by Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria in 2016, with consultation with the Rainbow Tick Advisory Group with updates where needed.

Executive Summary

In partnership with Lifeline Australia, and with support from QLife and ACON, this research report presents findings of lesbian (L), gay (G), bisexual (B), transgender (T), intersex people (I), and other sexual identity and gender diverse individuals (+) use of crisis support services (CSS) in Australia. This is the first research of its kind in Australia that explores the needs of LGBTI+ people during a time of personal or mental health crises. It focuses on their uptake and familiarity with crisis support services in Australia, their perceptions and experiences with crisis support services, and where they might seek other professional mental health service support during a time of crisis. This study enhances the evidence base for those working to design, resource or deliver services to meet the needs of LGBTI people in Australia during times of crisis.

Background

A significant and robust body of research has established that LGBTI+ people have higher rates of suicidal ideation, self-harm, and poorer mental health compared to heterosexual and cisgender populations.¹ Such rates can be attributed to the systemic, institutionalised and everyday experiences of discrimination, harassment and violence that LGBTI+ people often experience.² However, very little is known about where and whom LGBTI+ people turn to during a time of personal or mental health crises, and why they might choose to access certain pathways over others. Additionally, little is known as to what LGBTI+ people need in crisis support services during a time of personal or mental health crisis.

Approach

This mixed methods study included a survey with 472 participants, comprised of closed and open-ended questions, and 10 follow-up interviews. LGBTI+ health organisations and social networks, Facebook, and other social networking sites were used to recruit research participants. The study provides a detailed account of these LGBTI+ peoples' experiences and needs relating to personal and mental health crises, and crisis support services.

Key Findings

The results of this study highlight that over 71% of participants chose not to use a CSS during their most recent personal or mental health crises. Key barriers to accessing a CSS as well as counselling and mental health support services included anticipation of discrimination, 'I don't want to be a burden' narratives, lack of awareness of mainstream CSSs and LGBTI+ specialist counselling and mental health support services, and physical access, technological, and financial barriers to access crisis support services. Participants noted seeking other forms of support, including accessing medical professionals such as general practitioners and therapists, family and friends, and self-coping methods including mindfulness strategies and self-harm.

Recommendations

The results of this study lead us to make a number of recommendations to help mainstream crisis support and mental health support services engage positively with the LGBTI+ community, and to address the barriers that LGBTI+ Australians have identified in accessing crisis support services. These include LGBTI+ cultural competence and safety training, promotion and awareness, addressing intersecting needs, and target areas for further research.

UNDERSTANDING LGBTI+ Lives in Crisis

A summary of key findings

of participants did not reach out to a crisis support service in a time of need

39%

of participants cited lifeline as a recognised crisis support service

68%

of participants could name anywhere from 1-5 crisis support services

Participants

35.5% of our participants identify as either Bisexual or Pansexual, 23% Lesbian, 20% Gay, and 3% Asexual

12% of all participants identify as transgender, and 8% Genderqueer, 3% Agender, and 10% Non-binary

77% of participants were Caucasian-Australian, 4% Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islanders, and 7% were mixed-race

Participants from across all states were recruited; majority hailed from VIC, NSW, SA, QLD or WA

Background

While LGBTI+ individuals make up approximately 5-10% of the Australian population,³ they have significantly higher rates of suicidal ideation and poorer mental health.⁴⁻⁷ Contributing social factors include experiences of discrimination, harassment and violence, and ongoing social exclusion.⁵ LGBTI+ individuals face ongoing discrimination in a number of settings, including schools, workplaces, and in the general community. This impacts individuals in many ways, and research shows that they are at a higher risk of experiencing mental health, and/or personal crises.⁶ The Australian marriage postal survey of 2017 saw both mainstream and LGBTI+-specific crisis support services experience an increase in LGBTI+ people accessing their services.⁷

A crisis is often thought of as being caused by a negative event; however, it can also be the result of persisting, or underlying factors. LGBTI+ individuals face ongoing discrimination, and the accumulation of stressors relating to experiences of discrimination can lead to experiences of crises.⁸ Higher rates of self-harm, anxiety, depression, and non-prescribed substance use have also been observed amongst these groups.⁹ Australian research also suggests that LGBTI+ individuals report higher levels of psychological distress, but have fewer resources for coping with mental health crises than their non-LGBTI+ counterparts.¹⁰ Discrimination also affects this group's health in more direct ways, and LGBTI+ individuals commonly face discrimination from care providers and professionals.¹¹ As such, they often delay seeking care - both expecting, and fearing discrimination regarding their sexuality and/or gender identity.¹²

In spite of this, we know little about where LGBTI+ people seek crisis support and/or mental health support - much less why certain services are preferred over others. Therefore, in collaboration with Lifeline Australia, and with community support from QLife and ACON, this project investigated the needs of LGBTI+ Australians regarding access to, and use of, crisis support services (CSS). Our ultimate goal is to increase professional service uptake by LGBTI+ persons during times of personal and/or mental health crises.

In 2017, Australia conducted a nationwide postal plebiscite to gauge public opinion on the same-sex marriage debate. Prior to this, same-sex couples in Australia were able to enter civil partnerships in some states, but were not allowed to marry. Results of the plebiscite returned 61.6% "Yes" responses, and 38.4% "No" responses. This subsequently led to the consideration of a same-sex marriage bill in parliament, which was then passed into law.

The postal plebiscite sparked heated debate and extensive publicity efforts, where anti-LGBTI+ sentiments were openly aired. During the survey, crisis support services, helplines, as well as phone-/web-counselling services experienced a surge in demand for their services from LGBTI+ Australians, with certain services experiencing up to a 40% increase in users during this time. Resultantly, state governments in Western Australia, Queensland and Victoria were required to allocate additional funding to these services to meet this surge in demand.

Project Aims

The broad aim of this project was to develop an understanding of the needs that LGBTI+ individuals have in relation to crisis support as well as the challenges they face in seeking crisis support.

Our specific aims were:

1. To explore how LGBTI+ persons manage mental health, and/or personal crises. Specifically, how support services and support systems play a role in this process;
2. To understand the perceptions, and experiences of challenges preventing LGBTI+ individuals' from accessing crisis support, and/or mental health support services;
3. To understand how LGBTI+ persons cope during a time of personal or mental health crisis, and the steps they may take in seeking support outside of a crisis support service; and
4. To use these insights to make recommendations to crisis support services like Lifeline Australia, in the interest of increasing uptake and improving service quality.

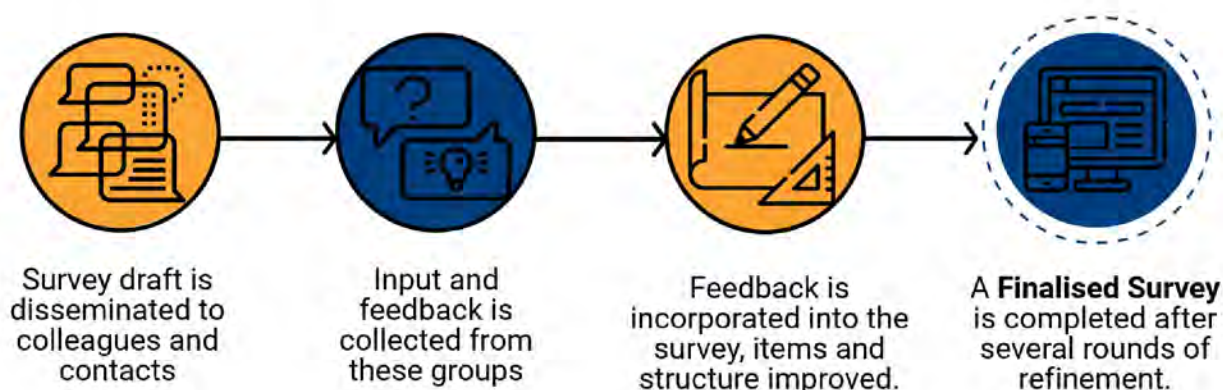

AT A GLANCE

Survey Design

Stage 1: Survey development

Stage 2: Refinement

Stage 3: Distribution & Data Collection

Methods

To address why members of the LGBTI+ community may use, or not use, certain services in times of crisis, this project utilised the format of a qualitative community-level needs assessment; a systematic process used to determine and address gaps or needs between current and desired conditions within a particular community.¹³

Ethical Considerations

Ethics approval was obtained from the La Trobe Human Research Ethics committee (Human Ethics ID: HECS18159), as well as from the equivalent bodies in both the AIDS Council of New South Wales (ACON RERC Ethics: 2018/15) and Thorne Harbour Health (formerly the Victoria AIDS Council; Ethics ID: THH/CREP18/001). Participants had the right to opt out of the survey or interview at any point – without prejudice, and were provided with a list of crisis support services they could utilise, if required.

Sampling

The sample for both the survey and interviews was a convenience sample – it may not represent all the experiences of the LGBTI+ population but does still highlight a diverse range of experiences in this population.

Survey

This project had two parts. The first, an online survey with a mixture of open and closed questions.

Survey Development

Referencing previous research conducted with Crisis Counselling Support (CSS) services, we developed a variety of items that would allow us to examine a participant's experiences relating to crisis support services from multiple points of view. This included both open-ended and multiple-choice questions, across multiple time-periods. These items were then organised in an intuitive order and compiled into a draft version on the survey engine, Qualtrics™.

This draft was shared with the reference group members QLife and ACON, and experts within ARCSHS for feedback. This was then collated, evaluated amongst the investigators, and suggestions were incorporated where appropriate. Changes made to our initial survey include: adopting more inclusive and easily-understood word choices, changes to specific items, and improvements to survey layout and user experience. Most notably, later versions of the survey directly explored participants' experiences as LGBTI+ individuals with CSS services. We incorporated items that examined participants' perceptions, and experiences of approaching crisis support workers with LGBTI+-specific problems (i.e., homophobia, coming out, etc.). The finalised version comprised 87 items and took 23 minutes on average to complete.

Recruitment and Data Collection

Various LGBTI+ community organisations were approached, and subsequently enlisted, for assistance to disseminate the survey to their members. Concurrently, paid advertisements were put up on numerous Social Networking Sites (SNS), and a social media presence was maintained by an investigator on behalf of the project, to answer general queries and to raise awareness of the project. This was done in an effort to recruit a diverse range of participants. Regardless of recruitment method, participants accessed the survey through a provided hyperlink – which redirected them to the site where the survey was hosted. A total of 472 participants completed the survey during the month of July 2018. We concluded survey data collection after 2 weeks, having surpassed our initial goal of 100 valid responses. Survey participants were not required to respond to every question, and could only provide responses to as many, or as few questions. The statistics presented in this report are based on the total number of completed responses.

Interviews

The second phase of this study involved semi-structured, qualitative interviews.

Recruitment

At the end of the survey, participants were given the option of expressing their interest in participating in in-depth interviews. Survey participants were under no obligation to do so, and potential interviewees were redirected to a separate online form, where their contact details were recorded. Potential interviewees were contacted via e-mail; care was taken to ensure demographic diversity. This process continued until we had recruited 10 interviewees. Interviews were conducted between August and September 2018.

Interview Schedule

Interview schedule items were brainstormed among the project's investigators, and were guided both by contemporary research, as well as emerging findings from the survey. These items were then further refined and developed as each interview was conducted, utilising the feedback from the various interviewers. Interview items related to a wide variety of themes; including, but not limited to: experiences of personal crisis, CSS use, life histories, mental health, and interpersonal relationships. The interview schedule was also reviewed by Lifeline and the reference group members from QLife and ACON.

Interviews

10 in-depth, semi-structured interviews were conducted by two project investigators. These spanned anywhere from 30 to 90 minutes and were conducted either using voice-over-IP software (i.e., Zoom), or over the phone.

Data Collection and Analysis

These interviews were recorded and transcribed verbatim. These transcripts were collated into a case file using Nvivo 12™. The project investigators first reviewed and coded each transcript independently, and then collaboratively - discussing, refining, and finally amalgamating our insights and analyses. After several rounds of this process, these codes were streamlined into broader, parent codes. Connections and interfaces between these themes were inferred, which subsequently informed the broad themes that are the basis of the discussions section. Quotations from both interviews and open ended survey questions used in this report may have been edited for clarity. Participants names used throughout are pseudonyms.

AT A GLANCE Survey Participant Demographics

Total participant count = 472

Survey Participant Demographics

Age, Ethnicity and Place of Birth

The mean participant age was 27.7 years. The majority of participants identified as White ($n=363$, 77%) and Australian-born ($n=401$, 85%). LGBTI+ Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders comprised 3.9% ($n=18$) of overall survey participants ($n=18$, 3.9%). These demographic characteristics should be taken into consideration when interpreting our findings. Since our sample was predominantly White-Australians, the resulting findings and discussion is in no way a holistic, or exhaustive representation of the challenges faced by People of Colour (PoC) and/or Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders.

Gender, Sexual identity, & Intersex Variations

We observed a relatively even distribution of sexual orientations – in particular, 24.0% and 11.5% of total participants identified as either bisexual ($n=113$) or pansexual ($n=52$) respectively. Responses were recorded from significant numbers of transgender participants ($n=55$, 11.7%), as well as substantial numbers of participants whose gender identities do not align with the sex they were assigned at birth ($n=88$, 18.7%). Women ($n=222$, 47.1%) made up the largest group of participants; together, non-cisgender individuals ($n=143$, 30.4%) comprised the second largest group of participants. Only one participant indicated they were born with an intersex variation ($n=1$, 0.2%), and three participants did not disclose their gender ($n=3$, 0.6%).

Bisexual and pansexual groups are well represented amongst participants. This is significant, as these groups are often underrepresented in research, and/or are simply grouped together with gay or lesbian populations - despite having distinct needs and experiences.¹⁴ A significant proportion of transgender and non-cisgender individuals were also recruited for our survey. The inclusion of responses from these groups is important, as there has been a tendency for existing research to discuss these groups in abstract, while overlooking their unique experiences.¹⁵

Socioeconomic Status

Participants were predominantly engaged in either Full-time ($n=106$, 22.6%), Casual ($n=76$, 16.1%) or Part-time ($n=67$, 14.3%) employment – with these 3 categories comprising 52.9% ($n=250$) of all participants. Of these, 16.4% ($n=41$) were on fixed-term contracts. A substantial portion of participants were either Students ($n=113$, 23.9%) or Unemployed ($n=66$, 14.1%), and a small minority was retired ($n=6$, 1.3%).

Most participants either lived in privately rented ($n=186$, 39.48%), or rent-free accommodation ($n=145$, 30.8%), while a small minority ($n=72$, 15.2%) owned their place of residence. The majority of participants ($n=380$, 80.5%) felt that they were in a secure housing situation, but a substantial minority ($n=85$, 18.0%) of participants felt insecure in their present housing situation. Participants mostly lived in suburban areas ($n=198$, 41.9%) or in a capital city ($n=147$, 31.1%), but many were also located in either a regional ($n=152$, 32.2%) or in a remote or rural area ($n=43$, 9.1%).

Participants largely indicated having received at least Full Secondary schooling ($n=147$, 31.1%) or some form of post-secondary education – and had either a TAFE Certificate or Diploma ($n=146$, 31.9%), a Bachelor's degree ($n=127$, 26.9%) or a Postgraduate degree ($n=54$, 11.5%). A smaller proportion of our participants either received Lower-Secondary education ($n=24$, 5.2%) or had a Technical/Trade Certification ($n=14$, 3.0%).

State Representation

The states best represented in our sample were Victoria ($n=119$, 25.2%), New South Wales ($n=79$, 16.7%), South Australia ($n=76$, 16.1%), Queensland ($n=73$, 15.4%) and Western Australia ($n=61$, 13.0%). We had fewer participants from the Australian Capital Territory ($n=30$, 6.5%), Tasmania ($n=20$, 4.3%) and the Northern Territory ($n=6$, 1.3%).

Religious/Spiritual Beliefs

Participants in our sample were largely non-religious ($n=316$, 67.5%). However, our sample did also include participants who followed an organised religion or spiritual belief ($n=130$, 27.5%), with the largest subgroups within this category comprising Catholics ($n=25$, 5.2%) and non-institutional forms of religion and spiritual beliefs (e.g., Wicca) ($n=63$, 13.5%).

Relationship Status and Number of Children

A diversity of relationships styles was noted. Participants who were single made up the largest share of the sample ($n=234$, 49.6%), but a significant proportion of participants reported being married or in a de facto relationship ($n=107$, 22.7%), or otherwise in a relationship ($n=117$, 24.8%). A minority of participants ($n=50$, 10.6%) indicated that they were parents to at least one child.

General Health, Mental Health Conditions, and Disabilities

The majority of surveyed participants reported that they were in either 'Good', 'Very Good' or 'Excellent' ($n=296$, 62.7%) health, with a smaller proportion of participants rating their general health as either 'Fair' ($n=129$, 27.5%) or 'Poor' ($n=28$, 0.6%). Participants who had either a physical or cognitive disability which resulted in some form of impairment and/or limited activity accounted for a significant proportion ($n=133$, 28.2%) of our sample. Additionally, the majority of participants reported that they were experiencing a mental health condition ($n=339$, 72.0%), and of these participants, most ($n=235$, 49.8%) reported having had this condition for more than a year. The majority of participants who had a mental health condition were clinically diagnosed ($n=303$, 64.2%), while a minority were self-diagnosed ($n=33$, 0.06%). This suggests that a substantial number of survey participants were likely to have/had been in the care of a mental health professional.

AT A GLANCE

Interviewee Demographics

The Reality of Experiencing a Crisis

In order to contextualise participant experiences, and to gain an understanding of the support structures that a participant could turn to during a time of crisis, we surveyed participants' experiences of personal and/or mental health crises. These were often related to discrimination against their sexual and/or gender identity, but just as often were related to more common personal problems - such as relationship and family issues, school, housing, financial, or work-related stress.

These were often not entirely distinct from one another. While the majority of participants described their crises as being contained within a specific timeframe, some also experienced longer-term problems. These typically arose from ongoing problems, such as financial difficulties, or chronic illnesses, or grief.

While we might think of crises as relatively short-lived events, this is only partially true. "Crisis" refers to a state of distress where an individual's emotional coping mechanisms are overwhelmed, and everyday life is disrupted, and does not occur over a specific duration.¹ For some participants, crises described arose from longitudinal factors that spanned a considerable amount of time.

I was working in a highly transphobic workplace, and was being actively bullied by upper management.

Avie, Queer, Genderqueer/Transman

My wife of three months and partner of 25 years passed away. I'm coping well on a practical level, but I'm feeling lonely, sad, abandoned.

Regan, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman.

I was entirely overwhelmed. I thought that nothing would ever be okay again. I just needed for everything to stop so that I could even begin to feel normal again let alone feel better.

Mark, Asexual, Transmale/Transman

I was experiencing multiple factors - work stress, or burnout, a chronic neurological condition that wasn't responding to medication, and a relapse of major depression and suicidal ideation.

Kenzie, Bisexual, Non-Binary

Findings

The findings of this study highlight the difficulties that LGBTI+ people experience during times of mental health or personal crises, as well as why they may, or may not, choose to utilise a crisis support or counselling service. We present findings from both the survey and interviews throughout this section, and we examine a number of key issues in turn. Participants have been allocated pseudonyms alongside their gender identity and sexual orientation.

We have used the identity terms provided by participants in the surveys and interviews. As such, there will be differences in how participants chose to identify themselves, or multiple uses of a particular term. For example, in regards to gender, some may use the term transgender, or transgender man, while others use transman, transmasculine or transmale. Queer may be used to denote a sexual orientation, a gender identity, or both.

We begin with an overview of familiarity, uptake, and ratings of, crisis support services.

We then discuss barriers to service uptake, which include anticipated experiences of discrimination, 'I don't want to be a burden' narratives, and lack of awareness of both mainstream and LGBTI+ inclusive crisis support and counselling and mental health support services, followed by a brief discussion of physical, financial, and technological barriers.

This is followed by a discussion of participant experiences of non-crisis support, including medical professionals, family and friends, and self-directed coping strategies.

The presentation of findings are followed by recommendations to improve LGBTI+ access to, and use of, crisis support and counselling and mental health support services during a time of crisis.

Uptake of Crisis Support Services

The majority of participants ($n=322$, 68.3%) were able to name anywhere from 1-5 crisis support services (CSS), with at least half of these participants ($n=184$, 38.9%) naming Lifeline among the services they recognised. Participants heard of these CSSs through a variety of sources - advertisements on television media, Social Networking Sites (e.g., Facebook), or on search engines (e.g., Google). Participants also heard of CSSs from their General Practitioner, mental healthcare professionals (e.g., psychologists and counsellors) and from schools or workplaces.

Uptake of Crisis Support Services

However, recognition of Australian CSSs did not often translate into participants' uptake of these services. Less than half of participants who could name at least 1 CSS ($n=139$, 29.4%) reached out to a service during their most recent crisis. Only 37 participants (26.6%) of the 139 participants who could name at least 1 service and reached out to a service used Lifeline during their most recent crisis.

Breakdown of Results

Lesbian people were more likely to use web-based services, while heterosexual people more likely to use phone-based services, and queer (sexual identity) people a combination of both. Transmale/transmen were more likely to use web-based services, while transfemale/transwomen more likely to use phone-based services, and genderqueer and transfemale/transwomen a combination of both.

During their most recent crisis, the majority of participants who used a CSS accessed a service exclusively via telephone ($n=66$, 48.5%), while a smaller proportion of participants exclusively accessed a CSS through a website or online service ($n=48$, 34.5%). A proportion of participants also utilised both modalities to access a CSS ($n=25$, 18%).

A few participants also contacted crisis support on behalf of a loved one during the latter's time of crisis. During these incidences, participants often acted as an intermediary for these individuals, particularly where the latter's emotional or psychological state made it difficult for them to converse directly with a crisis support worker. An example of this was recounted to us by an interviewee, who contemplated reaching out to a service when their partner was experiencing a psychotic episode. Participants who utilised a CSS in this way may feel unequipped to support a loved one through a time of crisis and may use the service both to cope with the stress of providing support, and for advice on how to do so.

LGBTI+ Specific Ratings of Services

Participants who indicated that they had used a crisis support service during their most recent personal crisis were asked to rate these services on dimensions relating to sensitivity to, and knowledge of, Sexual Identity and Sexuality, and Sex, Gender and Gender Identities. For Sexual Identity and Sexuality, the dimensions explored were:

1. Acceptance towards sexually diverse individuals;
2. Familiarity with sexually diverse related concepts; and,
3. Ability to provide support for sexually diverse specific issues.

Of the individuals ($n=96$) who provided a response for these items, a majority ($n=76$, 80%) indicated that service counsellors displayed 'Good' or 'Excellent' acceptance towards sexually diverse individuals and identities. Compared to acceptance of sexually diverse individuals, considerably fewer participants rated counsellors' familiarity with sexually diverse related concepts (57.9%, $n=55$) or ability to provide support for sexually diverse specific issues (37.9%, $n=36$) as either 'Good' or 'Excellent'.

For Sex, Gender and Gender Identities, the dimensions explored were:

1. Acceptance shown towards gender/sex diverse individuals;
2. Familiarity with concepts relating to gender/sex diversity; and,
3. Ability to provide Support for issues specific to gender/sex-diverse individuals.

Of the individuals ($n=71$) who provided a response for these items, a smaller proportion (56.3%, $n=40$) rated counsellors' acceptance of gender/sex-diverse individuals as either 'Good' or 'Excellent'. Fewer participants rated counsellors' familiarity (56.3%, $n=40$) with sex and gender diverse terminologies as good or excellent. Only 20% ($n=20$) of these responses rated counsellors' ability to provide support to trans and gender diverse individuals as either 'Good' or 'Excellent'.

Participants were more divided about whether or not Lifeline counsellors were LGBTI+-friendly, with 17 participants agreeing or strongly agreeing that Lifeline was an LGBTI+-friendly service, and 16 being either unsure, or disagreeing with this statement.

My experiences with Lifeline were mixed...I attribute this to the voluntary nature of call takers and they were generally older people. One particularly memorable woman made an offhand comment about my male housemate, who I was struggling to get along with, being handy for opening jars and taking out the bins, which has stuck with me!

Brandi, Queer, Cisgender Woman

I'd assisted a friend using Lifeline once before and they were so 'textbook' and impersonal. I wouldn't trust any service like that with information about my sexuality or gender identity, which makes it difficult to talk honestly about my experiences.

Erin, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

Lastly, we also surveyed participants on their perceptions of how inclusive crisis support services were of LGBTI+ individuals, such as use of LGBTI+ people in advertising and marketing, or engagement with LGBTI+ organisations and initiatives. Participants largely felt inadequately represented or included in this regard, with less than half (40.6%, $n=56$) rating these services 'Good' or 'Excellent' in their inclusion of sexually-diverse persons. Only a minority (42.0%, $n=58$) rated services as 'Good' or 'Excellent' in their inclusion of gender/sex-diverse individuals.

Barriers to Service

Key Barriers to Service Uptake

Participants (71%, $n=334$) who indicated that they had not used a CSS during their most recent personal crisis were asked why they chose not to do so via an open-ended comment question. Main reasons included: anticipated experiences of discrimination, “I don’t want to be a burden” narratives, and lack of awareness of both mainstream and LGBTI+ inclusive crisis counselling support and counselling and mental health support services. Additional barriers included physical access, financial, and technological barriers. These are discussed in detail below.

Anticipated Experiences of Discrimination

32.6% ($n=109$) of the 334 participants who chose not to use a service cited concerns relating to experiencing discrimination. Participants often stated that their decision not to utilise a CSS was made on the expectation or perception that they would experience discrimination targeting their sexuality, gender, or any number of other stigmatised or minority identities (e.g., ethno-racial identity, disability status). Anticipated discrimination has been described as a detrimental factor to an individual’s well-being, not only because it delays health-seeking, but also because it prevents the individual from disclosing important details from care providers that could help them provide more appropriate forms of support.¹⁶

Breakdown of Results

People who used a different term for their sexual identity were more likely to report concerns regarding anticipated experiences of discrimination, while transmen/transmale people were more likely to report concerns regarding anticipated experiences of discrimination.

Table 3: Breakdown of anticipated experiences of discrimination by sexual identity

Total anticipated experiences (n)	Lesbian	Gay	Bisexual	Queer	Pansexual	Asexual	Heterosexual	Different term
109	23.2%	11.6%	23.9%	32.8%	28.3%	33.3%	14.3%	35.7%

Table 4: Breakdown of anticipated experiences of discrimination by gender identity

109	11.8%	21.1%	40.0%	41.0%	27.0%	16.7%	34.7%

As LGBTI people often face discrimination in their everyday lives and in their engagement with social institutions such as medical and health services, it is not surprising this was a common theme amongst participants who chose not to use a CSS:

Don't have a lot of faith in the public system so I use informal supports while I wait for a psych/GP appointment. Also have quite a stigmatised illness and have had a bunch of bad experiences with counsellors, psychologists and specialists before so don't have a lot of trust for practitioners I don't already know/aren't explicitly at LEAST queer friendly.

Cassie, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

Feeling as though normal services wouldn't be able to understand the fear of being rejected for being gay as most professionals are straight.

Carrie, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

There was the worry of being brushed off, or having it affect my goal of surgically transitioning.

Morgan, Gay, Transmale/Transman

Getting assigned a random call centre operator is a gamble I am not able to risk when I'm already in a heightened state of distress. The chance that I could be matched with someone who is well-meaning - but ignorant - is high, and even a small misstep, or misunderstanding on their part...could be the straw that breaks my resolve to not harm myself.

Avie, Queer, Genderqueer/Transman

Anticipation of discrimination could include incidents such as potential misgendering of participants, or assumptions made about a participant's sexual orientation. Expectations of discrimination also affected participants' interactions with crisis support workers. One such way related to the perception that a crisis support worker would use heteronormative, and/or explicitly-gendered language, as well as language which privileged certain romantic orientations above others. This language tended towards the assumption of users as heterosexual, cisgendered, and/or monogamous.

Many participants were under the impression that crisis support workers would not be inclusive of LGBTI+ individuals, and/or alternative relationship styles - or at least not be well-informed on these topics:

The language is still so heteronormative - partner, ex, spouse...crisis support workers have no understanding of concepts like agreed polyamory or loving platonically with someone significant to you... I've used services in the past and have been brushed off, ignored or otherwise made to feel stupid.

Jessica, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

In this example, Jessica believes that mainstream services will use heteronormative language, which can alienate a user. In Jessica's case, these language choices and assumptions are not so much a problem per se, but rather, that Jessica feels a crisis support worker will hold rigid notions about relationship modes and romantic orientations, which is not exclusive to queer-identifying communities, as heterosexual people may also engage in polyamory and ethnical non-monogamy. Further, Jessica has had previous bad experiences with other health services which has impacted their decision to not use a CSS. Many participants like Jessica believed that a crisis support worker would be judgemental, and thus perceived as ill-equipped to support them in their time of need.

Some participants also felt that they were not “queer enough” to access a LGBTI+ specific service, but were too queer to access a mainstream one:

I did not believe I was “queer enough” to access queer-oriented services, but I was too queer for mainstream services to feel comfortable...

Tracy, Lesbian, Transmale/Transman

Tracey’s quote suggests that those who do not perceive themselves as fully accepted by the LGBTI+ communities (i.e., not “queer enough”) can be at a loss as to which service is right for them.¹⁷ As seen above, this group of participants may evaluate both LGBTI+-oriented and mainstream services as being unable to accommodate their experiences and/or needs, and subsequently, refrain from reaching out to either during a period of crisis.

Alongside anticipated experiences of discrimination were concerns about safety and confidentiality with 28% (n= 134) of the 472 total survey participants reporting concerns about confidentiality and/or anonymity, and 21% (n= 98) feeling unsafe while accessing a CSS:

I still get concerned about the impact on my career if I present to the public health system and also potentially getting hospitalised in a public setting where I could have a cross over seeing clients. All of these factors are a barrier for me and the only outcome I can see is accessing private support or even support interstate.

Aubrey, Pansexual, Non-binary, who works in mental healthcare.

I have concerns about my identity being known, as I work in the health sector.

Riley, Bisexual, Cisgender Man.

Table 5: Breakdown of concerns about confidentiality and not feeling safe by sexual identity

Table 6: Breakdown of concerns about confidentiality and not feeling safe by gender identity

Do not feel safe using a service	98	2.0%	15.9%	23.1%	20.0%	12.5%	18.2%	18.2%

Participants often framed these concerns in terms of their fears of being “outed” - many articulating that the disclosure of these identities could threaten their personal safety, and/or their professional lives. Additionally, participants who were aware of LGBTI+ specialist mental health and counselling services also expressed concerns about confidentiality:

Breakdown of Results

People who identified their sexual identity as queer were more likely to be concerned with confidentiality in using a CSS, while lesbian people were more likely than other groups to not feel safe in using a CSS. Transmale/transmen were more likely to be concerned with confidentiality, while transfemale/transwomen were more likely to not feel safe using a CSS service

LGBTI+ communities - at least in cities - are small, with only one degree of separation between many people who are working in service provision. I'm not sure everyone is as ethical as we would hope. I feel sure that there needs to be better training, and scrutiny around the personal ethics of those working in these fields, both in and out of the workplace.

Aspen, Pansexual, Cisgender Woman

[City name] is a relatively small city, where people are likely to be connected via social circles and this is even more so the case for LGBTI+ people. So, I get nervous about approaching services specifically for LGBTI+ people. I also worked in the health sector, and I don't wish to be recognised.

Blake, Queer, Cisgender Woman

In this context, concerns regarding confidentiality were not strongly associated with concerns about safety, but rather concerns centred on the fact that these services were staffed by members of closely-knit, local LGBTI+ communities, and peer networks. There was therefore a perception that these participants might be paired up with a peer when reaching out to a LGBTI+ specialist counselling and mental health support service, and that a counsellor could identify them.

Participants were not only concerned about potential discrimination based on gender identity and sexuality, but also, on other intersecting factors, including ethnicity, culture, and religious background. 44 (9%) of the total 472 survey participants noted ethno-cultural barriers in accessing crisis support services.

Table 7: Breakdown of results regarding ethnocultural and religious barriers by sexual identity

Religious	27	16.7%	8.1%	0.0%	8.0%	0.0%	9.1%	12.1%

Participants felt that a crisis support worker would be unable to meet the complex needs that these participants can present with. These individuals suggested to us that difficulties in working with a crisis support worker could arise not only from language barriers, but also from culturally-specific or linguistically-specific terminologies and concepts that were not easily explained or communicated. Some participants perceived current CCSs, both mainstream and LGBTI+ specific as being unable to address complex needs relating to ethnicity and culture background:

Breakdown of Results

People who identified as gay were more likely to report ethnocultural and religious barriers while people who identified as male were more likely to report ethnocultural and religious barriers.

I feel like a lot of people don't understand the cultural issues facing LGBTI+ People of Colour. They don't understand family dynamics, and how those play a role in mental health issues, and all social relationships. Without understanding that, doing anything else - including treatment - is hard.

Arjun, Pansexual, Genderfluid.

I didn't know how to properly explain my situation to someone else. A lot of the familial issues I was having tied in to South Asian cultural traditions, and I didn't feel like someone who didn't come from the same background would truly understand it, as some of my closest friends (who are Australian) didn't fully get it. .

Kiaan, Bisexual, Cisgender Man

Arjun refers to a number of factors at play, including familial relationships and their role in the psycho-social well-being of persons from his cultural background. As such, his second-hand experience of homophobia from his family members is all the more challenging to his mental health. Kiaan reported similar issues relating to their South Asian background.

27 (6%) of the total 472 survey participants also noted religious barriers to accessing crisis support services. Specifically, religiously-oriented mental healthcare services were perceived to not be appropriately-equipped to support LGBTI+ individuals, even if they were affirming of LGBTI+ identities:

I didn't know who to go to, or who to trust...I wanted someone who understands my faith, but will not tell me off for my sexuality.

Billie, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

As a LGBTI person who comes from a community that has been persecuted by religion, accessing a service that is delivered by a faith based organisation is too much of a risk - legally they can still discriminate against LGBTI people, and there is nothing you can do - why would an LGBTI person place themselves at risk of being discriminated against, when that is the cause of our poor mental health??

Kai, Gay, Cisgender Man

Religious participants reported somewhat similar experiences, on account of the fact that their needs with their regard to being religious and their sexual or gender identity were oftentimes not adequately met by services. Similarly, LGBTI+-oriented services were also viewed as not well-equipped to provide support for religious individuals:

The queer community can often be represented as hostile towards religious individuals, so I did not feel safe sharing my faith.

Chris, Gay, Cisgender Man

It's hard to find anyone who doesn't think my religion is a horrid blood sacrificing cult or equivalent.

Keran, Asexual, Agender

Lastly, some participants were concerned about calling crisis support services in case an ambulance or police service would be sent out. While only done in extreme circumstances, participants noted unintended consequences that can be particularly salient for the LGBTI+ population:

I get worried that they will send an ambulance or the police.

Jean, Pansexual, Transmale/Transman, explaining their decision against reaching out to a CSS.

I needed help, and asked for it and an ambulance was called for. Because of this I was reported to <social services organisation>, as my son was home... I think that was wrong of them...I was doing the right thing, making sure my son and I were safe.

Ainsley, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

In addition to the distress that arises from unexpectedly encountering ambulance and/or police services, individuals like Ainsley also experience long-term consequences that could precipitate into future crises. It is also important to note that LGBTI+ communities have a long history of trauma experienced from services like the police, such as the history of the criminalisation of homosexuality in Australia.¹⁸ Such histories can inform concerns about using a CSS that may need to deploy an ambulance or police during extreme circumstances and thus prevent users from seeking them out.

“I don't want to be a burden” Narratives

A recurring theme amongst participants was that CSSs only dealt with the more extreme crises, such as suicidal ideation, where 29% (n=97) of the 334 survey participants who did not use a service did not think their experience warranted crisis intervention.

Breakdown of Results

Asexual and agender people were more likely to report that they did not want to be a burden to a CSS.

Table 9: Breakdown of results 'I don't want to be a burden' narratives by sexual identity

Total who did not think they needed a CSS (n)	Lesbian	Gay	Bisexual	Queer	Pansexual	Asexual	Heterosexual	Different term
97	18.9%	21.4%	20.4%	17.2%	24.5%	33.3%	0.0%	28.6%

Table 10: Breakdown of results 'I don't want to be a burden' narratives by sexual identity

Total who did not think they needed a CSS (n)	Male	Female	Trans female/trans woman	Trans male/trans man	Genderqueer	Agender	Different term
97	18.3%	22.4%	13.3%	17.9%	16.2%	25.0%	24.5%

As such, many participants believed that unless they were experiencing suicidal thoughts, or were otherwise at immediate risk of self-harming, then their crisis was not "serious enough" to require support from a CSS or a counselling and mental health support service. Some participants also cited their belief that reaching out to a CSS would divert the attention of a crisis support worker away from other callers that participants felt might be in greater need of support:

I don't want to take time and resources away from people who need it more.

Jaden, Bisexual, Genderqueer

I think there is always someone worse off than me that may be trying to access the service.

Lane, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Necessity. I didn't feel like I deserved the help.

Jeremy, Gay, Cisgender Man

I didn't want to seem annoying or attention seeking.

Nicki, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Felt like my situation wasn't serious enough to justify using crisis services...and that I would be making a bigger deal of the issue than was warranted.

Andi, Gay, Transmale/Transman

I didn't think it was bad enough to use a service.

Tara, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

My background and upbringing placed a lot of shame on the idea of seeking help, and "burdening" people - which influences when and how I seek help.

Kelsey, Queer, Agender

Many participants' reluctance to use a CSS was also the result of feelings of being "undeserving" of help. Oftentimes, this was the case even when, and if, a participants' needs were appropriately pressing or distressing. This was consistent with previous research which suggests that LGBTI+ individuals experience lower self-esteem and self-worth.^{19 20} This has implications for CSS uptake - and, as demonstrated above, can be a barrier to CSS uptake.

These factors could also be compounded by one's cultural background and upbringing. As Jaden's response indicates, a cultural emphasis on self-sufficiency and independence can be highly relevant to a participant's decision to reach out to a CSS. For participants like Jaden, relying on a CSS for support disrupts, or contradicts their perception of themselves as independent individuals, and can be an important obstacle to seeking care. It was evident that these perceptions are not limited to specific cultures; as one interviewee tells us:

I feel like there's a sense of stoicism in the queer community "It's not so bad", "I'm ok", "I'm fine", and so much of my defence mechanisms is around stuff like this is avoidance - and it really took me by surprise how hard I was hit... maybe that's why the support services didn't really enter my mind...

Marley, Gay, Cisgender Man

Marley's statements reference wider, popular perceptions about the resilience of the LGBTI+ community - as seen by both popular media²¹ and academic interest on this topic.²² However, this focus on resilience can have a negative impact, implying an expectation that an LGBTI+ individual ought to be resilient. In actuality, there are substantial differences between resilience on a community-level, and resilience on an individual-level.²³ As such, this can place an expectation on LGBTI+ individuals to "grin and bear" their feelings of distress during a crisis.

Awareness of Crisis Support Services and LGBTI+ Specialist Services

136 participants (28.8%) were either not aware of crisis support services or LGBTI+ specialist services.

Breakdown of Results

Those who used a different term to describe their sexual identity, and those who identified as agender were the least likely to be aware of services available to them

Table 11: Breakdown of results of lack of awareness of services by sexual identity

Total not aware (n)	Lesbian	Gay	Bisexual	Queer	Pansexual	Asexual	Heterosexual	Different term
136	29.1%	30.8%	33.0%	27.3%	30.0%	20.0%	14.3%	35.7%

Table 12: Breakdown of results of lack of awareness of services by gender identity

Total not aware (n)	Male	Female	Trans female/trans woman	Trans male/trans man	Genderqueer	Agender	Different term
136	33.7%	31.7%	33.3%	30.8%	14.3%	41.7%	21.3%

Participant awareness of CSSs was an important factor which related directly to CSS uptake as well as whether or not participants felt their crisis warranted the attention of a CSS:

I wasn't aware crisis support services existed, or how to access them.

Nico, Pansexual, Genderqueer

I would like to see more information on the services on offer...they are of a good standard already, but can be hard to access or not commonly known of. Once you're in a crisis situation, you're not in the state of mind to start trying to source them, you need to be aware of them beforehand.

Campbell, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Campbell's statements further stress the importance of CSS awareness, and its relationship to user uptake; during a personal crisis, the emotional distress and/or negative affect experienced by an individual can detract from decision-making.²⁴ Consequently, an individual may not think to reach out to a CSS if they are not already aware that it is an option available to them.

Additionally, a participant who was aware of the more “mainstream” CSS might still be unaware that certain kinds of specialised support services - i.e., those that are LGBT-oriented, are available to them:

I think more advertising around queer-focused and queer-friendly services is needed. There were a couple listed in this survey that I hadn't heard of before, so I wouldn't know they were available to me...

Vic, Asexual, Genderfluid

I didn't really know what services were available, I didn't think there was anything to help me with figuring out my sexuality, and realising it was ok for me to feel this way.

Kim, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

Both Kim's and Vic's quotes highlight a lack of familiarity with LGBTI+-oriented services that they may have reached out to in a time of crisis. This suggests that while individuals who are grappling with their sexual and/or gender identities stand to benefit greatly from LGBTI+-oriented, or LGBTI+-affirmative services, they are also likely to be unaware that these services are available to them.

Finally, individuals who were aware of the CSS available to them may nevertheless be unaware of the nature of services provided, or if the needs they are presenting with will be adequately met by these CSS. As one participant told us:

I would never think to call a crisis hotline, because I perceive those as services you only use when things are really bad...I just don't know about services available to my community and what constitutes as a 'crisis', and therefore what help is available.

Ariel, Lesbian, Genderqueer

Concerns like those voiced by Ariel were centred on the oftentimes vague definition of “crisis.” These individuals weren't sure what was available to them during a time of crisis, or whether or not their condition met service eligibility criteria.

Physical Access and Technological Barriers

Participants were asked whether they felt, or have experienced, physical and technological barriers, with a total of 166 (35.2%) indicating as such. It is important to note that such barriers are not solely limited to LGBTI+ people, but rather, may be exacerbated by experiences of sexuality and gender discrimination in other aspects of social life, such as access to employment for financial security,²⁵ and access to safe housing.²⁶

Breakdown of Results

People who used a different term regarding their sexual identity were more likely to note report physical access barriers using a CSS; while asexual people were more likely for to report technological barriers. For gender identity, transmen/transmale were more likely to note report physical access barriers, while transwomen /transfemale were more likely to note technological barriers.

Out of the 166 (35.2%) participants who noted barriers, a substantial proportion (n=117, 70.5%) indicated that they faced physical access barriers in using a CSS. Oftentimes, this was related to difficulties in finding a private space to chat at length about their crisis and their gender and/or sexuality, without being overheard by family, peers or work colleagues:

I avoid a lot of web-based services because I don't have the internet at home and my phone data allotment is pretty small - and a lot of web-based things don't load well on a phone...When accessing phone support, it's a challenge to find a safe space to talk - I often end up just walking the streets and talking, which is physically difficult and uncomfortable, especially with my physical disability.

Quinn, Bisexual, Non-binary

I can't find a good place to chat or a safe place unless I am by myself which I hardly ever am. I also cannot leave class or use my phone at work.

Brenda, Pansexual, Cisgender Woman

Privacy to chat in a shared household especially with a family who doesn't value privacy. Talking can be heard in other rooms. I would need to go into a public space to have a chat.

Petra, Queer, Genderqueer

It's rare for me to be alone and unmonitored as I'm either at school where there are people everywhere or at home where it's not comfortable for me to talk about these things and there would be consequences if I was caught

Sandy, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

These difficulties could also relate to limited operation hours, and the accessibility of service premises:

I most find myself in these situations during the early hours of the morning and most services are closed at this time.

Jett, Pansexual, Genderqueer

Time- as I work full time as a teacher, it's often hard to access services during my hours. People are often around during recess and lunch, which minimises my privacy, and I cannot access Web-based services at work.

Theo, Queer, Transmale/Transman

This can be especially difficult for participants who may be concerned about their family finding out about their gender identity or sexuality.

16.9% (n=28) of the 166 participants who faced physical access and/or technological barriers to accessing a CSS also noted that financial constraints played a significant part in these experiences. Financial constraints were a common concern when accessing most forms of mental healthcare and could be relevant even when accessing free crisis support services.

Expenses involved in accessing these services was described as factors that limited or prevented a participant's access to CSS. These expenses were typically in the form of data charges and/or monthly bills for maintaining a phone plan, which are necessary for accessing some CSSs by both web and phone, as seen in the following responses:

We are a low income family, so our technology is slow. Service disruptions can occur, which is the last thing you need when you're acutely suicidal.

Ash, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman, describing financial barriers to service use.

It costs money to call crisis lines, and it shows up on your call history. I didn't want my family to know what was going on.

Rachel, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Financial constraints were often also described in tandem with technological and physical access barriers, with 44 participants (26.5%) of the 166 participants who noted barriers indicating that they faced technological barriers to accessing crisis support services:

I only have access to mobile data, as we don't have cable internet here. And I have a severe stutter, so phone calls don't really work well for me

Rachel, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Web based services are useless on a cheap mobile phone and require internet access. Phone based services are hopelessly overwhelmed.

Dan, Bisexual, Transmale/Transman

For instance, while a call made to a crisis support service is free-of-charge, the ability to place the call presupposes that a potential user has access to electronics like a phone or computer. Technological and financial barriers could also collide with physical access barriers, and a participant who lacked the financial resources to reach out to a CSS may be unlikely to afford the transport costs associated with physically accessing a service's premises, or may not reside in a safe place or have access to personal technology.

Seeking Other Forms of Support

Supporting a person experiencing a mental health crisis can require input from a variety of sources. While telephone and web-based crisis support services play a vital role, no single service or intervention could ever meet such significant need. As such, in this section we examine connections to other forms of support, starting with professional healthcare providers, followed by family and friends, and finally self-coping strategies.

Breakdown of Results

People who identified as heterosexual were more likely to use a medical professional, while pansexual people were the most likely to reach out to friends and family, and asexual people to engage with self-coping strategies. Transfemale/transwomen were the most likely to seek support from a medical professional, while those who said 'Other' for their gender were the most likely to reach out to family and friends, while those who identified as agender were the most likely to engage with self-coping strategies.

Professional Healthcare Providers

Over a third of total survey participants ($n=191$, 40.5%) reached out to either a General Practitioner (GP), and/or mental healthcare professional during their most recent crisis. It is crucial to note that participants who did reach out to a health professional did not necessarily eschew other forms of support. GPs and other professionals were often not well-situated to provide timely emotional or psychological support. The availability of these practitioners was often constrained by various factors like office hours, location of practice, and participants' financial situation. As such, a person might reach out to multiple forms of support in tandem, particularly when facing ongoing, or long-term problems or difficulties.

General Practitioners

Half of the participants in this group ($n=91$, 47.6%) reached out to a GP during their last crisis. GPs typically assisted with referrals to a specialist, or other service, prescribed medication (i.e., antidepressants or mood stabilisers), and worked with participants to formulate mental health care plans. As such, in most participants' experiences, GPs were often acting as intermediaries, rather than as primary mental healthcare providers:

My GP has been great, best doctor I've had. She has suggested I see a counsellor, and medication has improved my mental state considerably...unfortunately there is a limit to how much she can help me. She is good with referrals and other things she has the capacity to help with. I would not say any of these things have been true about previous GPs I have seen before, though.

-Cas, Bisexual, Non-binary

Some participants noted that GPs often provided some degree of immediate emotional support-particularly in instances where patient-doctor rapport had been previously developed. Additionally, for a small number of participants, GPs were their sole source of emotional, or psychological support, as seen below:

I only discussed physical symptoms...I was under quite a bit of pressure. My GP knows me well and I came away from the session feeling calmer. She listens.

Lane, Lesbian, Agender

During my crisis, I saw my GP face-to-face...I have a long term relationship with them; they know me and my mental health very well. I didn't feel telephone or web services could give me anything in addition to what my GP could.

Sam, Gay, Cisgender Man

However, this was not the same for most of our transgender participants, as GPs often also acted as partial "gatekeepers" for those who wished to access Hormone Replacement Therapies (HRT), or any form of gender-affirming surgery.²⁷ More generally, GPs are typically required to endorse and refer a transgender patient to a psychologist, and subsequently, a psychiatrist, before they are able to prescribe them HRT²⁸ - particularly if a participant wishes for the cost of gender affirming procedures to be subsidised by their health insurance.²⁹

My local doctors put me onto [service name]. The waiting list really was too long... Being over 40 made me suffer more anxiety, I was stressing over if my body will still change.

Nate, Bisexual, Transmale/Transman

I felt my life was on hold while waiting for my first appointment in [location] with [service name]. Then, I stayed awake every night, worrying if I would get referred to an endocrinologist. It really caused me a lot of anxiety.

Lou, Bisexual, Transfemale/Transwoman

Going to a GP was thus perceived as a potential source of stress for these participants, and thus was not utilised during a time of crisis.

Therapists, and other Mental Healthcare Professionals

Over a third (83.2%, $n=159$) of all survey participants reached out to a mental healthcare professional during the course of their most recent crisis. Within the group of participants who reached out to a mental health professional, the majority ($n=65$, 40.9%) reached out to a psychologist, while comparatively fewer participants reached out to either a psychiatrist ($n=20$, 12.6%) or counsellor ($n=29$, 18.2%) during this time. A good working relationship with these professionals appeared to aid the development of successful coping strategies for some:

My psychologist is very helpful. She has been my psychologist since before I was diagnosed with my mental health disability. She is patient, and listens well.

Kat, Asexual, Cisgender Woman, discussing their rapport with their psychologist.

Many participants cited this rapport as an important factor that inspired confidence in these therapists. While therapists were unlikely to provide timely emotional support when a crisis occurred per se, therapists were noted as having equipped a number of participants with strategies and techniques that enabled independent crisis management and self-coping:

When I spoke with my psychologist after my personal crisis, she was helpful...listening and supporting, but also gave me some tools. She suggested talking to my GP about some medical options for managing my social anxiety, which triggers my depression.

Laurel, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman, describing how their psychologist helps them cope during a crisis.

However, a number of responses from participants had had negative experiences with a mental healthcare professional. These were predominantly framed in relation to the practitioner's lack of awareness of issues pertaining to sexual and/or gender identities - or, more generally, to the quality of support rendered. These experiences also impacted participants' perceptions of crisis support workers:

I don't feel safe in using mainstream services as a queer person. I've experienced judgement, and done disproportionate educating to psychologists in the past - I can't do that during a time of crisis. That's not safe for my mental health.

Lucky, Bisexual, Non-binary, describing their previous experiences with psychologists.

Telephone and web counselling services are known to not be knowledgeable about LGBTI+ terminology, experiences, community, etc. I don't want to access a service, only to spend all the time educating the person who is supposed to be supporting me.

Chris, Gay, Cisgender Man, describing why they do not reach out to CSS

As Lucky's quote suggests, these experiences could be detrimental to an individual's psychological well-being, particularly during a period of vulnerability - such is commonly the case during a crisis. Additionally "shopping" around for a practitioner whose skill-set and expertise were a match to one's mental health needs was therefore a relatively common experience amongst participants:

We need more Medicare-subsidised access to mental health services - e.g., greater access to counselling etc, more than the 6-10 free visits issued under the mental health plans issued by GPs.

Andy, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

My partner was let down by crappy psychologists - he tried a few and the process did more harm than good. What could 6 - 10 sessions really achieve anyway?

Kenzie, Gay, Cisgender Man

For participants who relied on health insurance to subsidise the cost of seeing a therapist, having to trial several therapists could leave individuals with only a few subsidised sessions remaining to work with a therapist that was a good match for them. This was seen as part of a bigger issue - specifically, the perception that mental healthcare services were under-subsidised.

Family and/or Peers for Emotional Support

Family and friends can be another source of support during a time of personal or mental health crisis. Almost half of all participants who took the survey ($n=207$, 43.8%) reached out to family and/or peers for emotional support during their last personal crisis. Interpersonal relationships with either family members, or one's peers were a crucial source of support for some participants. Participants were asked to describe their experiences via an open-ended question, and a number of participants noted positive outcomes with relying on friends and family:

Since my friend also goes through the same thing I'm going through, they were willing to listen because they understand. They also know me a lot better personally - being my friend - than a professional, who is essentially a stranger. It helps that I know a lot about my friend too, so it makes talking to them a lot easier.

Avery, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

Avery's quote demonstrates that reaching out to these individuals could be a highly effective strategy for managing and coping with emotional distress, and that relying on these individuals for support could be a mutually fulfilling experience. However, a number of participants indicated negative experiences in relying on friends and family during a time of crisis, with 93 (27.7%) of total survey participants indicating that they would not go to family or friends:

They supported me during my crisis, but it was difficult for them to help, as it was painful for them to see me in pain.

Madison, Bisexual, Cisgender Woman

I messaged a friend, but he did not reply. He has previously listened, but has not been helpful.

Finn, Queer, Genderqueer

I tried to talk to them, but they were going through their own issues...so I shut myself away from everybody.

Joey, Lesbian, Transmale/Transman

Participants noted that if one family or peer chose not to engage with them, this heightened their concern about reaching out to other family members or friends during a time of crisis. Others did not want to burden their friends and family, and thus chose to not to enlist the support of a family member or close friend. Knowing that 71% of participants chose not to enlist the support of a CSS, and that many are concerned with reaching out to friends and family, LGBTI+ people may not be getting the support they may need during a time of crisis.

Self-Directed Coping Strategies

Participants' use of self-directed coping strategies during previous times of crisis was also explored. A significant portion of our participants indicated that they engaged in these strategies during a time of crisis (n*=213, 45.1%). Many of these participants utilised personal rituals, and even alternative/homeopathic medicine, in tandem with more orthodox coping strategies - including, but not limited to: maintaining proper sleep hygiene; meditation and mindfulness practices; as well as various forms of physical activity:

Trying to engage in mindfulness based practices especially breathing exercises, body scan, and guided meditation. This can be incredibly difficult when highly distressed or disconnected from my body, but I try. I also try to stick to regular sleep and eating routines- again, this can be hard to do.

Jo, Queer, Cisgender Woman

I attempt to use mindfulness and physical engagement to assist with mental health. The catch-22 is that depression makes you want to not move.

Kat, Lesbian, Cisgender Woman

As can be seen, however, being able to utilise these strategies was often a challenge, particularly while one was in the midst of a personal crisis, and was not always successful. Moreover, for individuals who experience mental health conditions that involve some impairment to executive function, these kinds of strategies could be especially difficult to implement. Additionally, many of the former were longitudinal coping strategies, which could be challenging for a participant to successfully and consistently incorporate into their daily lives.

A number of individuals indicated engaging in substance-use as a means of coping; managing personal crises through the use of intoxicating, and/or psychoactive substances. This is a well-established phenomenon, and recent research suggests that minority stress relating to sexual identity is not associated with an increased likelihood of substance use to cope.³⁰ While outside the scope of the current project, current research suggests that individuals who engage in substance use to cope may do so as a way to regulate their emotions.³¹

A smaller number of individuals also indicated turning to self-harm as a way of coping during personal crises. These were typically repetitive instances of low-severity, non-suicidal self-harm. Researchers have documented that this form of self-harm is used to manage feelings of dissociation, regulate one's emotions, and to establish interpersonal boundaries,³² as seen below:

I have unfortunately discovered that self-harm helps me not focus on my negative emotions. So far I've only scratched myself with my nails, and I haven't done it often. Wearing a rubber band on my wrist helps keep me calm because I know if I want to self-harm, I'll use the band instead of scratching. This actually lowers the risk I'll even use the band at all, because knowing that self-harm is a coping mechanism is itself a negative emotion I want to get away from.

-Val, Asexual, Genderfluid

Honestly...and I know it isn't healthy, but going whacko on (repeatedly punching) a wall is always relieving. Sure, it causes a few bruised knuckles, but I feel good after.

-Cameron, Bisexual, Genderqueer

It is crucial to note that individuals who do display these behaviours are not necessarily suicidal, and individuals may even use self-harm as a strategy to put a stop to suicidal thoughts.³³

Stage 4: Findings and Recommendations

Recommendations

The results of this study lead us to make a number of recommendations to help mainstream crisis support and mental health support services engage positively with the LGBTI+ communities, and to address the barriers that LGBTI+ people living in Australia have identified in accessing crisis support services (CSS). These include LGBTI+ cultural competence and safety training, promotion and awareness, addressing intersecting needs, and areas for further research.

LGBTI+ Culturally Competent and Safety Training

First and foremost, the study findings indicate a pressing need for mainstream crisis support services such as Lifeline to engage in LGBTI+ inclusive practice. Engaging in programs such as the Rainbow Tick program by Rainbow Health Victoria (formerly Gay & Lesbian Health Victoria),³⁴ as well as other community-based LGBTI+ training programs would be highly beneficial for crisis support services looking to support LGBTI+ Australians. This would enable the development and support of cultural competency and safety in mainstream service use. Such training would also enable services to gain a deeper and more nuanced understanding of the history of trauma of LGBTI+ Australians, such as negative and discriminatory experiences with community services associated with crisis support, such as the police and concerns about forced institutionalisation.

Such training needs to be on-going rather than one-off workshops and seminars, and specialised in working with the variety of subgroups within the LGBTI+ community, including diversity across sexuality and sexual identity, gender, and relationship styles. For example, bisexual and pansexual clients have a different set of needs to lesbian and gay people. Trans and gender diverse people also have different sets of needs compared to cisgender men and women. As such, training needs to be centred embedding inclusive practice within policies, procedures and operations of organisations, rather than just changing the minds of particular individuals.

While specialist LGBTI+ services can support some of the gaps highlighted in this study, it is important to recognise that some participants felt uncomfortable with using a peer-to-peer service due to concerns that they may encounter someone they know in the LGBTI+ community. As such, it is essential that LGBTI+ Australians have access to both LGBTI+ specialist services and mainstream services during a time a crisis.

Promotion and Awareness

The findings of this study highlight a number of areas that need to be addressed, in terms of promotion and awareness of crisis support and counselling and mental health support services. This appeared to be true for both mainstream and LGBTI-specific service. It is vital that crisis support workers working with these services have undergone appropriate LGBTI+ cultural competence and cultural safety training, and that publicity efforts for these services are undertaken to ensure that LGBTI+ Australians are aware of what is available to them during a time of personal or mental health crisis.

Awareness of Availability of Varying Service Modalities

Our findings also noted an overall lack of awareness of what is available to LGBTI+ people during times of personal or mental health crises - this was consistent across both mainstream and LGBTI-specific services. Participants on the whole were not aware of the different types of services available to them, or the difference between the kinds of support that different services provided. While such distinctions are apparent for those working in the crisis support service and counselling and mental health support service sector, these differences are not readily apparent to the general population. Rather, participants often considered crisis support services like Lifeline, and counselling and mental health support services such as QLife and beyondblue as being similar, or interchangeable in functionality. Participants also noted a preference for a variety of service models that would suit their specific needs; a commonly voiced preference was for text messaging-facilitated crisis support, which was seen as more convenient than a call-in phone line or web-based service.

As such, increased promotional awareness of what a service provides and the modes (phone, web, text messaging) that the service is provided is vital, so that LGBTI+ people are aware of what is available to them, and the kinds of support they can access. This may require services to assess the language and phrasing they use in promotional or advertising materials to reach certain populations, and to carefully consider if any assumptions of knowledge are placed upon potential users.

Awareness that Services are LGBTI+ Inclusive

Participants also noted that concerns about the potential experience of discrimination while using a mainstream crisis support service or an LGBTI-specific service meant that they avoided using them during a time of need. Such awareness needs to include that services are LGBTI-friendly (welcoming towards LGBTI+ people) and LGBTI+ inclusive (have knowledge of the specific issues and history of LGBTI+ experiences). Promotional marketing such as highlighting designated Rainbow or LGBTI+ Ally status, featuring LGBTI+ representation in promotional materials, use of LGBTI+ inclusive language, and use of LGBTI+ visual signifiers such as the Rainbow flag among others can help LGBTI+ people realise that a service is LGBTI+ friendly and inclusive. Services should undergo approved and highly recommended LGBTI+ inclusive practice programs prior to engaging in these steps.

Mainstream services could also take a more active role in the LGBTI+ community, by cultivating positive, mutually beneficial, and supportive collaborations and partnerships with LGBTI+ organisations. This can address any preconceived negative perceptions about the service, and reassure LGBTI+ people who may be unsure about accessing the service, particularly a mainstream one during a time of crisis.

Encouragement of Using Crisis Support Services

One of the strongest themes of this research was that a number of participants engaged on some level with an “I don’t want to be a burden” narrative. Participants felt that their personal experiences of crisis did not warrant the attention of a crisis support service like Lifeline, or a counselling and mental health support service such as QLife, instead often relying on self-direct coping mechanisms, or in other words, merely surviving.

It is vital that promotional activities are not only focused on messaging concerning seeking support for feelings of distress, anxiety, depression and isolation among others, but also, engage in messaging that reassures the population that they are not a burden, and that their feelings and experiences are important. In particular, messaging that reminds people that their issues or experiences of distress are not insignificant, and that a crisis support service or counselling and mental health support service is there to help may encourage more LGBTI+ people to seek the use of a service. This may also include broadening messaging that includes everyday experiences that can lead to feelings to distress, but are not necessarily recognised as distress.

Addressing Intersecting Needs

While not the focus of this particular project, the findings highlighted a number of perceptions that LGBTI+ people with multiple, disadvantaged identities have when choosing not to engage with a CSS. These multiple facets of identity could be a permutation of any of the following - disability, race and ethnicity, cultural background and/or religion. Such findings indicate that LGBTI+ People of Colour, LGBTI+ people with disabilities, and LGBTI+ people of varying religious beliefs and faiths face additional complexities in accessing crisis support, as well as mental health and counselling. These difficulties often related to concerns that counsellors may not be trained to understand these complexities. As such, recommendations for training are not only related to LGBTI-specific needs, but also training that takes into account the diversity of LGBTI+ experiences, with a focus on how other identities and statuses can inform these experiences.

Further Research

A number of key areas have been identified for further research in this study, particularly exploring the Training of Crisis Support Workers, and the health and crisis support needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander LGBTI+ people, and LGBTI+ People of Colour.

Supporting the Training of Crisis Support Workers

Further research is needed to explore gaps in the training of crisis support workers to understand the challenges they may have experienced, or perceive, in engaging with LGBTI+ service users and how these might be addressed by training or organisational development. This will enable services to understand what is needed to ensure cultural competence among such organisations, and how they can be supported. This can also involve research on how existing LGBTI+ organisations can help support the training of mainstream service providers to be LGBTI+ inclusive. This could include a detailed exploration into how crisis support workers regard their capacity, confidence, and competence in working with LGBTI+ people,³⁵ including – but not limited to – their familiarity with specific issues that can inform higher rates of mental ill-health among this population. This would allow the specific training needs within services to be established so that services are not only aware of LGBTI+ issues, but also feel competent in responding to these and to provide a culturally safe environment for LGBTI+ people

Health and Crisis Support Needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander LGBTI+ People

Research that specifically sets out to investigate the mental health needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander LGBTI+ individuals is also needed. The findings presented within this report may not be an accurate reflection of the experiences and needs of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander LGBTI+ individuals. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander LGBTI+ individuals experience unique factors that inform their experiences and needs, which may be different to non-indigenous LGBTI+ individuals, and non-LGBTI+ Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders. They experience anti-LGBTI+ discrimination within traditional communities, and racism within wider Australian society.³⁶ Additionally, they are also poorly represented on a broad range of social and cultural issues.^{37 38} Researchers argue that this group has been uniquely impacted by European colonisation, which has eroded customary gender and/or sexually-diverse practises.³⁹ Individuals within this group may also identify with culturally-specific gender/sexual identities (i.e., brotherboy, sistergirl, etc.),⁴⁰ and have experiences that cannot be simply derived from the findings of research with non-Indigenous populations.

Health and Crisis Support Needs of LGBTI+ People of Colour

LGBTI+ People of Colour (PoC) were underrepresented in the present report, and are generally also understudied within the Australian context. However, what was evident from the responses provided by ethno-racial minority participants was the need for culturally-sensitive, or culturally-inclusive forms of crisis support. Additionally, larger-scale, quantitative research could be conducted with these groups to more accurately understand the mental health needs of LGBTI+ People of Colour, and how they engage with mental health services. More recent qualitative research with these groups strongly indicates that these individuals may experience alienation from their families, communities of origin, as well as the broader LGBTI+ community.⁴¹ It should be noted that attempts to better meet the mental health needs of this group should take into consideration the inherent diversity of ethno-cultural backgrounds within this group.

Summary

To help provide better support for LGBTI+ Australians during a time of personal or mental health crises, an exploratory study of LGBTI+ Australians experiences with CSS was conducted. The first study of its kind in Australia, a mixed methods survey of 472 participants, and 10 follow-up interviews were conducted to gain a better understanding of the current needs of LGBTI+ Australians during a time of personal or mental health crisis, and barriers to accessing CCSs and other counselling and mental health support services.

The findings of this study indicate that 71% of LGBTI+ Australians chose to not utilise a crisis support service during their most recent personal or mental health crisis, an alarming figure when noting that LGBTI+ people have higher rates of poorer mental health, self-harm, and suicidal ideation than their heterosexual and cisgender peers.⁴² This percentage was premised on perceptions, rather than experiences of CCSs, and these were informed by experiences in using other non-crisis support mainstream health and medical services, as well as broader systemic and everyday experiences of discrimination in Australian society. Nearly a third (29%) who did use a CSS or counselling and mental health support service during their most recent crisis generally noted favourable experiences.

The anticipation for discrimination was the major reason LGBTI+ Australians did not want to use a CSS, alongside feeling as though their experience of crisis did not warrant the attention of a CSS service, and not being aware of what was available for them to utilise. Additional barriers included concerns relating to confidentiality and anonymity, concerns relating to the involvement of intervention services such as the police and forced institutionalisation, finding a safe space to use a service, and financial and technological access barriers.

Acknowledgements

We'd like to first acknowledge and thank the participants who took the time to complete the survey, as well as those who offered to be interviewed for this project.

We'd also like to thank the Lifeline Research Foundation, Lifeline Australia for funding this important work, as well as the reference group members QLife and ACON who provided feedback on many aspects of the project, as well as Thorne Harbour Health who provided feedback on the ethics component.

We'd like to thank the Australian Research Centre in Sex, Health and Society staff and students who assisted with the development of the survey by taking time to test out questions and provide feedback for revision.

We'd like to thank the many organisations and individuals across Australia who supported this project by spreading the survey across their mailing lists and social networks, as well as Gay and Lesbian Health Victoria who assisted with the development of the Glossary of LGBTI+ Terms.

Glossary: LGBTI+ Terms

Developed by GLHV@ARCSHS, La Trobe University (2016) The Rainbow Tick guide to LGBTI-inclusive practice. Prepared by Pamela Kennedy, Melbourne: La Trobe University. Some terms have been updated since the publication of this glossary, and additional terms have been added where necessary.

Affirming gender	The process a trans or gender diverse person undertakes to live as their true gender. This may include medical treatment (surgery, hormone therapy and other treatments), a change of name, using a different pronoun, and changing sex on identification documentation such as a birth certificate, passport or drivers licence. This process is also referred to as Gender Affirmation (see Transition below).
Agender	Is a term which can be literally translated as "without gender". It can be seen either as a non-binary gender identity or as a statement of not having a gender identity.
Asexual	Asexuality is the lack of sexual attraction to others, or low or absent interest in or desire for sexual activity. It may be considered the lack of a sexual orientation, or one of the variations thereof, alongside heterosexuality, homosexuality and bisexuality among others.
Biphobia	The fear, hatred or intolerance of people who are bisexual, or perceived to be bisexual, that often leads to discriminatory behaviour or abuse.
Bisexual/bi	A person who is sexually and/or emotionally attracted to people of more than one sex. Often this term is shortened to "bi". Related terms include pansexual , hetero/homoflexible , and nonmonosexual .
Bisexual erasure	Bisexual erasure or bisexual invisibility involves a failure to recognise bisexuality in general or individuals who are bisexual. Bisexual erasure can involve a failure to consider that someone who is in a relationship with a person of the same or opposite sex may be attracted to people of more than one sex.
Brotherboy	See Sistergirl in this glossary.
Cis/Cisgender	Cisgender describes a person whose gender conforms to the dominant social expectations of the sex they were assigned at birth.
Cisgenderism	Cisgenderism describes beliefs and practices that privilege cisgender people at the expense of people whose gender does not conform to the dominant social expectations of the sex they were assigned at birth. Cisgenderism devalues people whose experience of their embodied gender does not fit within a binary model of sex and gender.
Coming home and Coming in/Inviting people in	Coming home and Coming in are terms preferred by some people to Coming out (see below) because they don't pressure individuals to publicly declare their sexual identity, gender identity or intersex variation. Some people from non-Anglo cultural backgrounds prefer these terms because they don't rely on dominant, western identity categories. They give them greater choice and flexibility in how they describe themselves and in who they invite in and seek support from.
Coming out	The process through which an LGBTI person comes to recognise and acknowledge to themselves and/or others, their sexual identity, gender identity or intersex status.

Coming out is never a once-off event. Rather, it is a repetitive process where LGBTI people have to make decisions if, when and with whom to be out to in every new personal, social or work situation.

Cultural safety /security (competence)

Cultural safety and security acknowledge and affirm cultural differences while at the same time addressing the power imbalances that exist between marginal and dominant groups. They involve addressing the risks to minority individuals and groups that this power imbalance can bring. An organisation or practitioner develops their cultural competence so as to provide cultural safety for individuals and communities, through an approach to service delivery and professional practice that is responsive to the beliefs, values and practices of different groups or populations. The term is often used to highlight differences between the values and practices of minority and marginal groups and those of the dominant culture. While the term has most commonly been applied to racial, ethnic and religious minorities, it has recently been applied to sexual, sex and gender identity diverse communities and to the provision of LGBTI-inclusive, culturally safe services. Related terms include cultural awareness, cultural proficiency and more recently cultural humility.

Disability

Disability results from interactions between a person's impairment, understood as functional limitations, and the social, physical and attitudinal barriers they face. Addressing disability involves removing these barriers and minimizing the impact of living with an impairment on a person's life.

Discrimination and Indirect Discrimination

Discrimination is when you treat, or propose to treat, a person unfavourably because of a personal attribute or characteristic. Under Commonwealth legislation it is illegal to discriminate against someone on the basis of their sexual orientation, gender identity or intersex status. Indirect discrimination is when you include an unreasonable requirement that is likely to disadvantage someone on the basis of one or more protected attributes.

Equity

Equity is about fairness, and making sure all people have access to the same opportunities. This does not involve treating everyone the same. Rather, it involves recognising that everyone is different and providing individuals and communities with the things they need to ensure that everyone has the same opportunities.

Gay

A person whose primary emotional and sexual attraction is toward people of the same sex. The term is most commonly applied to men, although some women use this term.

Gender diverse

A broad term that encompasses a diversity of gender identities and gender expressions including: bigender, trans, transgender, genderqueer, gender fluid, gender questioning, gender diverse, agender and non-binary. Gender diverse refers to identities and expressions that reject the belief that gender is determined by the sex someone is assigned at birth.

Gender Dysphoria /Gender Identity Disorder

Gender Dysphoria or Gender Identity Disorder is a medical diagnosis given to trans and other gender diverse people who are experiencing discontent and distress resulting from 'gender identity issues'. The term is seen as pathologising by many because it implies that trans and gender diverse people are "disordered".

Gender expression (Gender conforming and non-conforming)

The way someone chooses to publicly express their gender, through name, pronoun, clothing, haircut, mannerisms etc. Gender conforming refers to behaviour and modes of presentation that match the dominant social expectations of the sex someone was assigned at birth. Gender non-conforming involves behaviour and

	modes of presentation that do not match the dominant social expectations of the sex someone was assigned at birth.
Gender identity	Gender identity has a specific meaning under State and Commonwealth Equal Opportunity and anti-discrimination legislation. In broad terms, however, it refers to a person's deeply felt sense of being a man or a woman, both, neither, or in between. For example, an individual who has no gender identity or a gender identity that is neutral may refer to themselves as agender or gender free. Some people's gender identity may vary according to where they are and who they are with.
Genderqueer	A person whose gender identity is not limited to or by the binary categories of male or female. Genderqueer people may identify as masculine, feminine, bigendered or partially male or female. Some genderqueer people may be third-gendered or reject gender roles altogether (see Gender Diverse above).
Gender Questioning	The process of questioning the belief that gender and gender identity are necessarily determined by the sex someone is assigned at birth. People who are gender questioning may express their gender in ways that do not match the expectations of the sex they were assigned at birth or they may reject gender categories all together.
Gender Reassignment Surgery (GRS) (also known as SRS or GCS)	A surgical procedure where an individual's body or sexed anatomy is aligned with their gender identity. Also known as sex reassignment surgery (SRS) or genital confirmation surgery (GCS).
Heteronormativity and Heterosexism	Heteronormativity is the belief that everyone is, or should be, heterosexual and cisgender and that other sexualities or gender identities are unhealthy, unnatural and a threat to society. Heterosexism describes a social system built on heteronormative beliefs, values and practices in which non-heteronormative sexualities and gender identities and people with intersex variations are subject to systemic discrimination and abuse. For example, assuming that someone is heterosexual, and that they are in a monogamous, married relationships can be understood as heteronormative.
Heteroflexible/homoflexible	Hetero/homoflexible is a form of a sexual orientation or situational sexual behaviour characterised by minimal homosexual activity in an otherwise primarily heterosexual orientation, which may or may not distinguish it from bisexuality. It has been characterised as "mostly straight" or "mostly gay."
Homophobia	Fear, hatred or intolerance of people who are same-sex attracted or are perceived to be same sex attracted, including lesbians, gay men and bisexuals, which often leads to discriminatory behaviour or abuse.
Inclusive practice/service provision	The provision of services that is respectful and aware of the culture and beliefs of the recipient. This includes the provision of services to LGBTI people that recognise and affirm the values and practices of the LGBTI community.
Internalised biphobia /homophobia/transphobia	The internalisation by LGBT people of heterosexist beliefs, values and practices that can lead to feelings of reduced self-worth, shame and sadness.
Intersectionality	Intersectionality understands that identity, a person's sense of "who they are", is not singular but rather an effect of multiple, intersecting social categories. These categories are effects of complex socio-historical processes and reflect deeply entrenched relations of power and inequality. For example, many LGBTI people also identify as Aboriginal, religious, having a disability, and more. For any individual, these categories are not discrete but mutually constitutive. For some people, they are mutually reinforcing; for others, there may be tensions or contradictions between different categories that leads to a fractured or dissonant sense of identity.

Intersex and Intersex status

Intersex people are born with physical sex characteristics that don't fit medical and social norms for female or male bodies. These include a diverse range of genetic, chromosomal, anatomic and hormonal variations. Intersex is understood as a political, embodied identity, and intersex people can have a range of gender identities and sexual orientations.

(Updated from IHRA.org.au 02.12.2018)

Lesbian

A woman whose primary emotional and sexual attraction is toward other women.

LGBTI+

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans and gender diverse and intersex people. The + indicates other sexual identity and gender minority groups not listed.

LGBTI+ People of Colour Communities

The term "People of Colour" is used in reference ethno-racial groups who are not white. The term encompasses all non-white people, and emphasises common experiences of systemic racism.

Misgendering

Describing or addressing someone using language that does not match that person's gender identity or expression. For people with intersex variations, this may include a presumption that they have a non-binary gender identity, or that they identify exclusively as a man or a woman.

Monosexism

A belief system grounded in the misconception that people are only attracted to other people of one gender, causing exclusion of and discrimination against non-monosexual people.

MSM/WSW

Men who have sex with men (MSM) and women who have sex with women (WSW), terms often used in public health literature and may be more common in non-Anglo speaking countries. Both MSM and WSW are contentious, with some claiming that these terms contribute to erasure of LGBTI identities, while other scholars highlight that LGBTI is an Anglo-centric/Global North concept and erases local meanings in non-Anglo countries.

Non-binary

Non-binary refers to a model of the relationships between sex and gender that does not assume a radical division between sex (a person is either male or female but not both or neither) and gender (a person is masculine or feminine but not both or either). People who are non-binary may have sex characteristics that do not fit a binary model of male or female or may express their gender in ways that do not match the dominant social expectations of the sex they were assigned at birth.

Non-monosexual/nonmonosexual

Nonmonosexual people are attracted to more than one gender. Nonmonosexuals may self-identify as bisexual, pansexual, omnisexual, polysexual, or another sexual/ romantic identity.

Open Relationship

See Polyamory.

Pansexual/Omnisexual/Polysexual

Terms used to describe people who have romantic, sexual or affectional desire for people of all/multiple genders and sexes.

Polyamory

Polyamory is the practice of, or desire for, intimate relationships involving more than two people with the knowledge and consent of everyone involved. Sometimes referred to as multiple ethical relationships or consensual or ethical non-monogamy. May also be used interchangeably with open relationships.

Preferred pronoun

A pronoun is a word that refers to either the people talking (I or you) or someone or something that is being talked about (like she, it, them, and this). Gender pronouns (he/she/they/ze etc.) specifically refer to people that you are talking about. A gender pronoun is the pronoun that a person uses for themselves. For example: If Alex's pronouns are she, her, and hers, you could say "Alex ate her food because she was hungry." Preferred pronouns are a recognition that someone's preferred pronoun use may not correspond with their gender identity. Asking and correctly using someone's pronouns is one of the most basic ways to show respect for their gender identity. See also Pronoun Cueing.

Pronoun cueing

Using words and actions to send a "cue" about someone's gender. This is a proactive and respectful way of making people aware of someone's gender who might otherwise be misgendered. Examples include using "She" or "The woman who was speaking yesterday..." to talk about a woman who had been misrecognised as male by friends or co-workers.

Queer

Queer is often used as an umbrella term that includes non-heteronormative gender identities and sexual orientations. The term has also been used as a critique of identity categories that some people experience as restrictive and limiting. For some older LGBTI people the term is tied to a history of abuse and may be offensive.

Romantic orientation

Refers to an individual's pattern of romantic attraction based on a person's gender, specifically, who someone feels they generally fall in love with. This is considered distinct from sexual orientation, which refers specifically to a person's patterns of sexual attraction, which is distinct from romantic attraction. This may include:

Aromantic: Lack of romantic attraction towards anyone (aromanticism).

Heteroromantic (or heteromantic): Romantic attraction towards person(s) of the opposite gender (heteroromanticism).

Homoromantic: Romantic attraction towards person(s) of the same gender (homoromanticism).

Biromantic: Romantic attraction towards person(s) of two or more, but not all genders. Sometimes used the same way as panromantic (biromanticism).

Panromantic: Romantic attraction towards person(s) of any, every, and all genders (panromanticism).

Demiromantic: Romantic attraction towards any of the above but only after forming a deep emotional bond with the person(s) (demiromanticism).

Same-sex attraction/attracted

Sexual and/or emotional attraction toward people of one's own sex. This includes lesbian, gay and bisexual people and people who may be questioning their sexuality, or do not want to label themselves. The term has also been used to describe young people whose sense of sexual identity is not fixed and experience sexual feelings toward people of their own sex. Others prefer the term same gender attracted.

Sex/ Sex characteristics	A person's physical characteristics relating to sex, including genitalia, chromosomes or hormones and also secondary sex characteristics that emerge at puberty.
Sexual and/or gender minority	Sexual and/or gender minority is a group whose sexual or gender identity, orientation or practices differ from the majority of the surrounding society. Such terms may be understood as less inclusive.
Sexual orientation	Describes a person's sexual or emotional attraction to another person based on that other person's sex and/or gender. The term is restricted in law to sex only and refers to attraction to persons of: the same sex (gay and lesbian); different sex (heterosexual); or persons of both the same and different sex (bisexual). Pansexual is a term that is used to describe someone who is sexually and emotionally attracted to other people regardless of their sex, gender or gender identity.
Sistergirl/Sistagirl	Some Aboriginal, Torres Strait Islander and South Sea Islander communities use various terms to describe or identify a person assigned female or male at birth and identifying or living partly or fully as another gender. In these communities, Sistergirls have a distinct cultural identity and often take on female roles including looking after children and family. Other communities will use different terms to describe gender diversity. These include Brotherboy which is sometimes used to describe an individual assigned female at birth who has a male spirit. However, in other Aboriginal, Torres Strait Islander and South Sea Islander communities Brotherboys is used as a generic term to describe a group of men who relate to each other – "my brothers" – and similarly Sistergirls is used to describe a group of women.
Trans/ Transgender	A person whose gender identity or expression is different from that assigned at birth or those who sit outside the gender binary. The terms male-to-female and female-to-male may be used to refer to individuals who are undergoing or have undergone a process of gender affirmation. Transgender and trans* are older terms and may now be seen as less inclusive than trans and gender diverse. Terms that may be used now include transman/transmasculine/transmale, and transwoman/transfeminine/transfemale among others.
Transition	The process by which a trans or gender diverse person affirms their gender. Transition may include some or all of the following: cultural, legal or medical adjustments; telling friends, family and/or colleagues; changing one's name and/or sex on legal documents; hormone therapy; or, surgical intervention. For some trans and gender diverse people the social context of transition may be more important than the physical aspect of transitioning.
Transphobia	A fear, hatred or intolerance of people of who are transgender, or perceived to be transgender that often leads to discriminatory behaviour or abuse.

Glossary: Crisis Support Service Terms

Acute or situational crisis	An acute or situational crisis is understood as an unexpected crisis that arises suddenly in response to an external event or a conflict concerning a specific circumstance. The symptoms are transient, and the episode is usually brief.
Crisis Support Service (CSS)	A Crisis Support Service (CSS) is a service specifically designated to provide support during a time of acute crisis. Such services are generally linked in with other intervention or emergency services including the police and ambulances to provide immediate intervention, such as if a caller is at risk of suicide or self-harm. Examples including Lifeline and Suicide Call Back .
Counselling and mental health support services	Counselling and mental health support services are specifically designated to provide support and counselling. Such services are designed to link users in with other mental health and other social services, but are not directly linked with intervention services such as the police. Examples include beyondblue , headspace and QLife among others.
Intervention or emergency services	Intervention or emergency services are services that are designed to provide immediate emergency support or intervention to a situation. Police, ambulances, and firefighters among others can be understood as an intervention service.
Personal & mental health crises	Personal crises refers to everyday life and events that can contribute to an experience of crises, such as family or relationship breakdown, work stress, or a traumatic event. Mental health crises refers to an experience of crisis that may be directly related to a pre-established or undiagnosed mental health issue, such as depression, anxiety or complex mental health disorders such as borderline personality disorder.
